

Angel Wings Return To Play Role

In the ninth grade's chapel program, a pair of little angel wings, discarded three years ago, came back into prominence.

Three years ago they belonged to Janet Weaver. After Janet used them twice and her sister once, her mother decided to discard them. Miss Edith Farmer, thinking they might be needed in a school play, asked for them.

The very next year they were used in the seventh grade's chapel program. This year Janet, much to her surprise, found herself wearing them again.

Miss Farmer is still keeping them for, who knows, they may appear in a play next year.

Ex-Student Prospers From Right Subjects

Proof that the school often knows the right subjects for students to take came in a letter from Rex Vick, a former student, to Miss Edith Farmer this month.

He wrote that he "especially" wants to thank her for seeing that he took the right subjects in high school.

"A student doesn't realize how important algebra and geometry can be in later life while he is going to school," he declared.

Rex is now working in Newport News, Virginia, at the Newport News Shipbuilders and Drydock Company, where he has to use many of his high school subjects in his work.
