

How Positive Are You - - - - - By Sue Weaver

To listen to conversations in the hall, one would think everybody knows what he wants to do when he graduates, especially an upper classman. Is this true? Let's see.

The senior and junior class presidents seem to know more definitely than anyone else what vocation they plan to follow after college. James Wells, the senior president, wants to go into engineering work of some kind after college graduation. Almeta Brown, junior president, declares, "I want to be a grammar grade teacher."

SOME UNDECIDED

When I asked Lane Farmer, also planning to go to college, about her career, all I received was a blank stare; then she rallied and replied that she wanted her aptitude and interest to determine her choice.

Catching Adrian Mitchell, a junior, and Carroll Bottoms, a senior, after lunch, I queried them about their future plans. They reported that they planned to serve in some branch of the Armed Services after graduation. Carroll added that he might go to college, but right now he is undecided.

Questioning Katy Horton, a junior, I got the reply, "I want to go into commercial work, either as a secretary or an operator for an I.B.M. Bank machine."

Bailey's star basketball player, Jimmy Dew, affirmed, "I am working toward a basketball scholarship, but my vocation is undecided."

Barbara Boykin is facing a big problem as to what she will do after graduating from high school this spring. She says she wants to go to college and maybe study fashion designing; or, as an alternative, she "might" go to business school.

Louise Wells, another senior, is trying for a college scholarship but is undecided about a future career.

After these conversations, I came to realize that the upper classmen aren't as certain as they appear. I wonder about the lower classmen.
