and I want you to capture that pennant and wave it for Reed for all you're worth."

"Kid, I couldn't do that," she answered.

"But you must," I said. "Our success depends on it."

She agreed and I got back to the Reed players' bench just as the signal for "time up" was given.

"Dennis, some ladies want to meet you," I told him, and escorted him over and introduced him to Louise. I started back, and as I approached Shorty, I knew Louise was doing fine. There was a look upon Shorty's face that resembled a rattlesnake, a bulldog, and a thunder-cloud combined. Dutch Schultz was saying, "Shortish, luke at dat feller talkin' to your girl. I'd kill him."

Shorty started to act upon the given advice, but after much persuasion, and some force we got him to wait until the next half, when, we told him, he could kill them all if he wanted to.

The half started. We kicked off, and as luck would have it, the ball went as straight to Dennis as if it had been shot out of a gun. The remarkable thing about it was that Shorty and the ball reached him about the same time. Shorty literally flung him about ten feet, and nearly killed him. After knocking out several others Shorty was put in the back-field. And Reed was licked to a frazzle, that's all. We emerged at the top with the pennant.

A RESCUE.

(Crayon Efrd.)

Looking eastward from one of the tallest peaks of the Rocky Mountains in Anzora there is a broad and fertile valley which is divided by a large stream, whose banks are fringed with overhanging grass. To the right of this stream is a field in which oftentimes a flock of sheep may be seen grazing on the tall grass which grows abundantly. A large oak tree stands about the middle of this field, and at the time of our story a boy with a big shepherd dog was enjoying the priceless shade which this tree produces.

From the looks of everything it was about 6 o'clock in the afternoon of a very warm day. The boy, realizing the fact that several of his sheep were crippled and the path across the mountain rough, thought it was about time for him to start home. Then, giving a call with which the sheep were familiar, he set out.

As he and his charges were climbing over the large rocks, one of the little lambs fell from a high cliff down into the gorge. The boy stood and looked at the suffering half-dead lamb and wondered whether he should risk his own life to save a simple, little lamb or see that the other sheep were gotten home.

He stood there with his head down and thought very seriously about what he should do. He im-
