LUNAR LETTER

By BEN BUNN.

(The writer uses this name, for everybody likes 'em.)

Derè Edie:—

I sure am glad you all rote me, for I tell you I was scared you had been scent to France without the government telling me. And my hart would just bust if I had heard if you all had went. Honey, you don't know how I feel now. My, I just want to put on that new fandangle skirt of mine and my new shoes and go to the drug store and get a dope.

You didn't know I had a new pair of shoes, did you?? Hone, I'll tell you how I got them. I sold War Saving Stamps and sold them for 27 cents, so I made two cents on every one and I sold 100 stamps and I thot I would buy me a pair of those high-top boots; you know, those kind Sadie Brown used to wear.

The shoe man told me they was good leather and I could tell they was when I got them wet for they wouldn't draw up. They would crack open, and if I got a pair of socks to match people couldn't tell the difference. I took them home and put them in a tube of water and gee they done just like he said, only the soal is a whole lot thicker and just as springie. I sure is proud of them shoes and I know you will be. Pet, to think you will soon be discharged.

I just can't wait for them old Sea Boards train to come bringing you back to my arms and we can stroll thru ma's garden and smell those onions and other vegetables like we used two. You know that old Tom Webb. He wrote me a letter the other day and he just called me all kinder sweet names. But he needn't think I'm going to rite or have anything to do with him, for I think too much of my honey and you remember the time we went to Mary's party and we were playin' post-office. You remember he kissed me rite in front of you, that just made me so mad that I just swelled up so much with anger that my pettycoat belt busted. I never will forgive him

I think he ought to have waited till you wasn't round, don't you? Well, dearie, I will have to close for this time as ma wants me to help put the children to bed. I hope honey I can always have a job like that.
