Umpires

There's a line line a baseball player should walk when an umpire's call goes against him.

The first thing to understand is that the umpire is not going to change his call. The player can tell the ump what he thinks and then go on about his business. That should be the end of it.

Whenever I thought a bad pitch was called on me, I would carefully avoid showing up the umpire in front of 40,000 people. Instead, I would pick up some dirt, step back out of the batter's box until I was next to the umpire and say, 'I thought that pitch was low.' The ump would say, Well. I thought it was a strike.' And that would be all. Why dwell on it? The call is already made and he's not going to change it. Even if he wanted to change the call, he won't because it would make him book

So what did my strategy accomplish? Nine times out of 10, when that same pitch was made in the seventh or eighth inning, the call would go in my favor. Some people might call it reverse psychology. All I was doing was treating the umpires like they're human beings. And, for that matter, as long as we have human beings doing anything, they are going

It's easy to point a linger and use the umpire as an excuse for not getting the job done. Players say 'the umpire put me in a hole,' or 'the umpire took a pitch away from me.' I didn't believe in pointing lingers. It was up to me to take care of myself. If they called a bad strike on me, I always felt I had two more left. The only thing that really bothered me was if the bad call was on a third strike.

They sure didn't pay me to get thrown out of ball games arguing with an umpire. The closest I came was on a called third strike. The ump didn't like my protest and signaled me out of the game. What he forgot was that I was the last out of the game, and it's impossible to throw a player out after the game is over.

Now and then I'm asked about using instant replays on close calls, I am against it in baseball and have misgivings about it in football. If we had it in baseball, games would end up lasting five hours instead of two. In football, fans see a touchdown and have to wait 15 minutes before they know whether to cheer or not. As a fan myself, I'd rather see them add more football referees to catch the close plays and drop the long replay delays. Id
