

A Critical Look At New Science Building

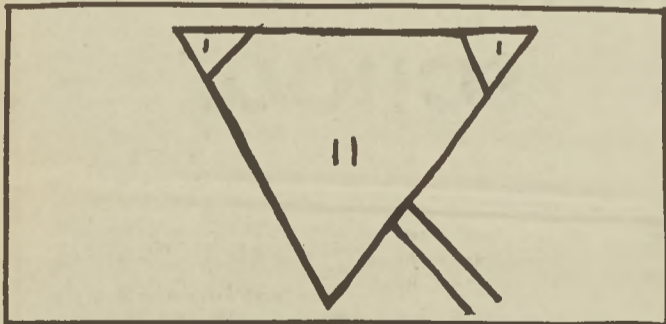

Our badly needed new science building has now put in nearly two years of faithful service. It's modern facilities, air conditioning and comfortable seating have been a break to all of us. With the new Public Address system installed it should be just perfect, right? Maybe not.

One thing the new building does not have is classroom walls. The rooms are blocked off by partitions and cabinets, leaving plenty of open space between classes and, as some students are finding out, at times it also lacks peace and quiet.

A room-full of students can get pretty noisy, especially when they are participating in labs or projects. Two or three of these together can create quite a roar. That's fine if everyone in the building is dissecting frogs, but what about the fourth class that's deep into A.P. Chemistry? Many are studying for high marks, and you can't study with 100 kids talking at once.

In all fairness to the teachers, it's impossible to keep an oversize class quiet if they're working individually. So, we can either reconstruct the entire building, or maybe we could try a little consideration and try to keep it down. Also, feel free to submit your suggestions for improvement to the administration.
