

Failure On Both Parents And Teachers To Perform Duties Hurts Youth

Letter To The Editor:

The youth's failure in school can be attributed to both parents and teachers. Parents have a responsibility to support and encourage students throughout their educational experiences. At-home parents should demonstrate an interest in every aspect of their child's education. Parents should teach and train their children at home, so that when they attend school they are prepared for the learning environment. They should be trained at home to have good behavior so that their teachers can teach them. Parents should have a willing attitude to work with teachers to help educate their child.

As far as teachers are concerned, they have a responsibility to teach and encourage the youth. They should have an open and honest communication with parents and make every effort not to discourage the youth, but keep them motivated about learning. The Honorable Louis Farrakhan warned us about how many teachers discourage the male child. The failure of the youth in school is the result of the parent and teacher not performing their duties in the education process.
