Course in Educational Aeronautics at Fisk Ends

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — The course in educational aeronautics introduced by Fisk University in the 1945 summer session was concluded August 30 with a talk by Dr. C. H. Gilmore, Director, Division of Aeronautics Education, State Department of Education. Stressing the importance of emphasis on instruction, Dr. Gilmore said that the coming of the air age opened up an immense body of material for the enrichment of subjects already taught in the average school curriculum.

The course at Fisk, which was designed to help college students and public school teachers of this and succeeding generations understand and appreciate the meaning of the air age, consisted of the following subject: civil air regulations, navigation, meteorology, theory of flight and engines, communications, aircraft familiarization, social, geographic, and economic implications of aviation, plus the hours of flight training.

There has been an excellent maintenance of interest throughout the course, said Dr. James R. Lawson who, with Dr. David F. Bender, has been responsible for the major portion of the ground training, "and we feel that there is a very definite possibility of instituting the teaching of aeronautics in the Negro high schools in Nashville."

With Tennessee in the vanguard of those states instituting the teaching of aeronautics in the public schools, said Mr. James Taylor, the flight instructor from Tuskegee Institute, "Fisk University, as the inaugurator of this present aviation project, may find itself in a position to foster the teaching of aviation throughout the state of Tenn." According to Mr. Taylor, the progress of the students, whose ages ranged approximately from 18 to 65 years and varied from college seniors to those with highly specialized degrees, was much better and during the next two weeks he harvested twenty-two bushels making a total of fifty-seven bushels. Mr. Lewis used three bushels from this one-half acre for table consumption, friends, and canning. Making a total of six bushels produced on one-half acre. The cost of fertilizer, seeds, etc., was $21.70 excluding labor and hauling.

the Italian people? Torchi said in other talks with department of State's Torchi said he had given them a complete understanding of the needs and thinking of the Italian people on the subject of colonies.

Rynes had been asked whether the American position in the question had been clarified in light of published reports of a division within the department. These reports had held that a strong element within the department, headed by Asst. Secy. James C. Hume, favored permitting Italy to retain her colonies. Another factor, however, favored disposition of them in some way left open by the United Nations charter.

Rynes acknowledged that he had received several memoranda setting forth divergent views, but refrained from going into the content of any of them. He held, however, that the United States held an open mind on the subject. He planned to digest the material handed him on the voyage over. He left on Tuesday evening for London.
