How Patents Are Born

In the evolution of most inventions—from original idea to issuance of the patent protecting the inventor—there are six major steps, as shown in this drawing prepared by National Patent Council.

- (1) After conceiving a new idea, the inventor usually endeavors to develop a practical model of his device through trial and error, either in his own workshop or using facilities of his employer or others.
- (2) The inventor gives a rough sketch or model of his invention to his patent attorney, who makes a "search" through issued patents of a similar nature to determine whether all of the idea has already been patented.
- (3) If the "search" shows probable patentability, the attorney prepares a formal patent application picturing and describing the invention and presenting carefully worded "claims" to define what is thought to be new. This is done sometimes before a model is made. No model is required by the Patent Office.
- (4) After the application is signed by the inventor, it is mailed to the Patent Office. The government filing fee is $30.
- (5) Upon receipt in Washington, the application is directed to one of the Patent Office's 70 divisions and a patent examiner is assigned to the case. After studying the application and searching through prior patents and publications, the examiner points out issued patents showing similar inventions and allows or rejects one or more of the applicant's claims, depending on what he finds is really new. The inventor's counsel then amends claims of the application as may be necessary to limit them to what is "new and useful" and therefore patentable. He files the amendment. The examiner again agrees or disagrees. This process continues, sometimes for years, until agreement is reached on claims to be allowed. A patent may have one or many claims.
- (6) The patent is issued to the inventor, usually through his attorney, following payment of a final government fee of $30. A brief description and drawing of the invention are published in the Patent Office's weekly Official Gazette.

The U. S. Patent System gives the inventor exclusive control for 17 years of that which is claimed in his patent. The hope of financial reward afforded by this protection is the incentive that inspires men to work hard to create new products and processes.
