Ike Agrees To Compromise Version Of Controversial Civil Rights Bill

BY ALICE A. DUNNIGAN

WASHINGTON, D. C. — President Eisenhower surrendered to a compromise version of the civil rights bill this week in spite of the deluge of correspondence showered upon the White House and Congressional leaders urging them to stand pat in opposition to a jury trial amendment.

The President told his news conference Wednesday that he would like to see the jury trial amendment made stronger. But he would be willing to accept a compromise rather than let the bill go into an election year. He did not think that it would be proper to have the emotions of the people torn over such issue next year during Congressional and State elections.

NO NEED FOR SPECIAL SESSION

He hopes that Congressional leaders of both parties will get together and finish action on the civil rights bill this session because he saw no usefulness in contemplating a special session.

In reply to a question the Chief Executive admitted that his present position is a compromise to some extent over his original stand. But the modifying proposal to jury trial amendment would have sufficient effectiveness to be acceptable to everyone but would also quiet any justifiable alarm of those who fear excessive punishment under the bill.

DOESN'T WANT BILL 'HELD OVER'

The President objected to the bill being held over until the next session of Congress because he does not approve of "political snarling" over an issue which involves the basic right of so many millions of our citizens. He said he could not conceive of political parties bickering over the question of who will be to blame for such legislation.
