HEALTH HINTS

Tonsils Are Not A Mistake of Nature!

A tendency to sore throats does not mean the tonsils have to be removed; that is, unless they are infected so badly that they are no longer able to perform their important function. Every once in a while it is discovered some part of the body can be removed without any apparent damage resulting. The parts removed are classified as a sort of error committed by nature. But nature makes no mistakes, and it is soon realized there was a function for the removed organs. The reason sometimes given is that it is "preventive"—the type of logic which suggests the amputation of a hand because a finger might some day be infected.

We now know the tonsils have a definite and most important function. They are throat filters and are guardians of the respiratory system and the body. There is a clear connection between the sudden, enormous rise in the number of children stricken with polio, and the over-all increase in polio cases. Polio, which was once not nearly so prevalent as it is today, rapidly became a nation-wide epidemic.
