CP&L Story Told In History Book

Carolina Power and Light Company this week will release a book length history of electric power development in the area of the Carolina which it serves.

The 338-page book is beautifully bound in maroon and gold, is illustrated with 55 pages of pictures plus many charts and drawings and contains an extensive index, appendix and bibliography. It was written in easy-to-read style by Jack Riley, former newspaperman and journalism professor who is now publicity director for the power company.

The book will be given to all of the 2,100 CP and L employees who request it and also will be made available to libraries, to school reference shelves and to the general public through book stores.

D. Haden Ramsey, former Asheville editor who read much of the manuscript, commented: "An admirable job! The recital is particularly vivid." He said the extraordinary corporate history "makes a distinct contribution to the history of the various communities which the company has served."

"History has a way of highlighting political upheaval, war and other destructive forces," says the book cover. "It is equally appropriate that history recognize the heroes of constructive effort."

The book seeks to do this by human interest stories of men recorded that human interest and events involved in electric power development. Much of the material was gleaned from old newspaper files according to Riley, whose acknowledgments extend a low bow to the writers who
