

The Road to Bagdad

By GEORGE GIBBS

SYNOPSIS— Beautiful Camilla Dean is touring Egypt and Palestine with a party of Americans. On the voyage she has many admirers, among them a wealthy Syrian known as Joseph Asad, in reality Hassan Isar, leader of fanatical Arabs in Palestine. She meets also the English-bred American, Ronald Barker, known as El Kerak, mysterious leader of the tribes opposed to Hassan. Camilla accepts the attention of Hassan to gain information helpful to Barker, who has warned her that she may be in danger if she continues her tour. She accepts Hassan's invitation to go to Damascus, accompanied by some of her American friends. She visits the home of Hassan's father, the sheik Arif-el-Arif, where she is joined by Hassan who renews his proposal of marriage, but she refuses him.

CHAPTER XI

Mr. Willing, having tourist business in Damascus, turned the party over to Michael, who drove, seated beside his Syrian chauffeur and guide. The Syrian's name was Zaagi and he spoke English and French, telling tales of the country they were passing through and of the tribes that inhabited them. From time to time they passed caravans of mottled camels and dromedaries on the road to Palmyra. But more interesting were the tribesmen, in kaffiyeh and kumbar, riding spirited horses which pranced and pirouetted as the great bus thundered past and the riders shot their rifles into the air, the bullets whizzing close to the bus while they shouted and laughed in amusement at the tourists.

"I'd hate to meet that crowd on a dark night without a machine gun, a few bombs and some tear gas," Slim said.

But the chauffeur only smiled the superior smile of the Syrian, which is more superior than any smile in the world. "Machine guns! Bah, monsieur, would you shoot with machine guns at a lot of children? It is their way. They are just having a good time."

"Sure! But the next bunch may not think they're having a good enough time. I'd feel more comfortable if we had some rifles and ammunition in case they gang up on us."

Zaagi laughed again. He seemed to find a great deal of pleasure in Slim's remarks.

Michael drove carefully and when a herd of camels blocked the way, waited patiently until they had passed. A sharp-featured fellow stuck his nose in at Kitty Trimble's window and made an ugly face at her so that she screamed in terror. If Hassan had been in the party he would have prevented any such unpleasantness. She wanted Michael to turn the car and go back to Damascus, but Janet and Josie laughed at her.

Camilla confessed to herself a slight uneasiness over the indifferent air of the guide, Zaagi. But he had come well recommended from the most respectable garage in Beirut, and bore credentials from the French government.

"Besides," Michael added in explanation, "he brought me an excellent letter from Hassan Isar."

"Hassan!" Slim's mouth sagged open. "I guess that makes it unanimous. Say, Camilla," he muttered, "I don't like that Zaagi guy a little bit. If he runs us into any trouble, he'll be the first one to go."

Slim was rather proud of his big automatic which he carried in a shoulder holster and exhibited childishly. Michael had a gun, too, and Janet Priestly carried a little .22 Smith and Wesson in her handbag.

Zaagi was driving now and Michael joined them in one of the rear seats. Michael was more interested in the performance of his great engine of transportation than in any social or diplomatic question. The road they took was unlike the hard-surfaced and graded highways from Jerusalem to Beirut. Caravan travel had ironed out some of the rough spots but it was still merely a trail over the desert, and it took careful driving to avoid the rocks that were hidden under the dust in unexpected places.

"I made this wheel base as short as I could," Michael explained, "but it's hard to keep the body off the ground. We've got to choose our terrain carefully, leaving the road when necessary, to make the riding easy."

It seemed to Camilla that they had been off the road ever since Zaagi had been driving, but she cheerfully accepted Michael's explanation.

"Are you sure this guy knows where he's going?" Slim asked, eyeing the country dubiously.

They seemed now to be in the very heart of the desert, for the herds of camels and asses that they had noticed nearer Damascus were no longer to be seen! nor were there any signs of caravans or groups of horsemen as before. Just the undulating of the horizon, with here and there the serrated edges of rock piercing the distant sky.

When the speed of the bus was reduced, as now seemed necessary most of the time, the heat was intense and the tourists were all perspiring freely.

"You ain't seen nothing yet," Slim said as Josie complained.

"How hot is Bagdad?" "A hundred and fifteen when it's cool—and a hundred and forty when it decides to get warm—"

They were all game except Kitty, who had subsided in her seat, her face mottled and her eyes bulging, gasping feebly from time to time that she wanted to return to Damascus. Michael, exhibiting a map, said he hoped to reach Palmyra in the afternoon, but if they didn't make better time it might be later. He explained that it didn't matter where they stopped for the night as they were taking their hotel with them, and there was plenty of water and provisions for everybody.

"It's quite exciting," Josie said. "The grandest picnic I ever went on," sighed Janet happily.

It was increasingly exciting as the great bus seemed to be having difficulties of its own, lurching and tilting unpleasantly like a ship in an angry sea. There was, so far as they could see, no sign now of road or trail, and they were passing over virgin soil that had not even been trodden by the hoofs of camels.

"Say," said Slim, who had followed Michael forward to the chauffeur's bench, "this gink doesn't know where he's going. Look what we're coming to—"

They had reached the top of a precipitous slope covered with angry-looking basalt rocks which seemed to end in a chaos of minor precipices. "Put your brakes on, man!" Slim roared.

Zaagi obliged grudgingly, giving Slim a sickly smile that was still superior. "I come a shorter way, monsieur," Zaagi explained.

"Get back to the road," Michael commanded, with a sudden realization that the bus had somehow got into a difficult position. "I'm not going to smash this bus on her trial trip."

Zaagi moved one shoulder slightly, and putting on power, seemed to be finding a way between the jutting stones that would bring them back to safety, when miraculously there appeared out of nowhere among the rocks in front, beside and behind them, groups of mounted Bedouins galloping to the car, gesticulating with their rifles and shouting incomprehensibly.

"What does all this mean, Zaagi?" Michael demanded.

"I don't know, monsieur. It is a branch of the Anazeh and they come to welcome us to their country."

Zaagi opened the door and there was a short colloquy. When the conversation was ended Zaagi turned with simulated despair. "They ask tribute for passing through their lands," he said. "It is the custom of the country, they say."

A man in a red pelisse who seemed to be the leader of the group now raised a hand commanding attention. He was taller than the others, wore a small brown beard and, judged by the standards of his people, was handsome of face and well formed in figure.

"He says," Zaagi translated, "that he wishes to examine your luggage and requests that you all step down while he does so."

"I'm darned if we do," Michael replied.

There was a moment of silence while the sheik sat gravely with an air of great dignity and patience, smiling at last as if in commiseration of their unreasonable attitude. When he spoke it was with a stern expression. "He says," Zaagi interrupted, "that it will be much better if you do what he asks. He will perhaps detain you a few minutes."

The situation crystallized almost immediately as Michael took Zaagi by the collar of his tunic and threw him from behind the wheel, falling into his seat and turning on the power. Zaagi put a hand into his shirt and drew out a knife which he swung with a dangerous motion toward Michael. But Slim fired quickly and Zaagi dropped, rolling at the feet of an Arab who had come up the steps. That was the beginning of the trouble. Michael was trying to get the car in gear when somebody shot at him. Slim's automatic came into line again and fired several times. The sounds of firing now came from all directions. Michael had been hit in the shoulder and crumpled over the wheel, but he fired a final shot at the man clambering up the steps toward him while glass clattered and Janet Priestly's tiny revolver sounded like the yapping of a fox terrier above the roar of the heavy rifles. Camilla, still bewildered by the sudden conflict, rushed forward to pick up Slim's gun from the floor of the bus, when she was seized violently and carried bodily outside.

It was lively while it lasted, and fatal at least to poor Slim who had fallen prone, bleeding badly from a wound in his chest. Michael Gay still sagged over the wheel, a bullet in his shoulder, and Janet looked disgustedly at her little empty pistol and let them hustle her out to the ground. Doc Williamson, who was unarmed, obediently followed the directions of the bandits. Torelli was giving aromatic sprays of ammonia to Kitty Trimble, who had fainted.

Camilla was aware of the man in the red pelisse urging her again toward the horse, and as she did not try to help him two men lifted her bodily and put her in the saddle. She was sure that it was useless for her to struggle, so she submitted, permitting them to lead the horse away from the group and over the hill to a flat plain which seemed limitless in every direction, except toward the mountains which they were leaving behind them.

There was no chance of escape. Two men rode with her, one on each side. She spoke to one of them in English, then in French, asking where they were going but she got no reply—unless his forbidding silence could be considered one. She tried the man on the other side with the same result.
