

The Road to Bagdad

By GEORGE GIBBS

SYNOPSIS—Beautiful Camilla Dean is touring Egypt and Palestine with a party of Americans. On the voyage she has many admirers, among them a wealthy Syrian known as Joseph Asad, in reality Hassan Isar, leader of fanatical Arabs in Palestine. She meets also the English-bred American, Ronald Barker, known as El Kerak, mysterious leader of the tribes opposed to Hassan. Camilla accepts the attention of Hassan to gain information helpful to Barker, who has warned her that she may be in danger if she continues her tour. She accepts Hassan's invitation to go to Damascus, accompanied by some of her American friends. She visits the home of Hassan's father, the sheik Arif-el-Arif, where she is joined by Hassan who renews his proposal of marriage, but she refuses him.

CHAPTER XII

It was then that the sheik in the scarlet pelisse, who had been riding behind her, rode up and took the bridle of her horse from the man on her right who drew rein and took up the rear. "I regret, mademoiselle," he said at last, in execrable French, "that I was obliged to make you come with me against your will. But you will not be hurt or treated badly if you do as I command."

"But what of my friends who are still alive? What of the bus with me one to drive it?"

He made a deprecatory gesture. "It was bad that the big man should kill my companions. If he had not shot them no harm would have come. He is a God-forsaken man."

"You haven't heard the end of this," she said angrily as her courage returned. "There must be some law, even in this God-forsaken country."

"Pardon, mademoiselle," he said, with polite incomprehension. "Where are you taking me?" she asked. "Who is the man who planned this crime? And why do you take me instead of the others?"

The sheik moved one shoulder and a hand as a gesture of incomprehension. There seemed no hope for her, less hope even than for the other survivors of the disaster.

It was toward the middle of the afternoon that Camilla's captor rose in his stirrups and pointed to a hill that rose above the surrounding plain. As they drew near she saw at its base the black ghostlike tents of a Bedouin encampment. Horses, camels and dromedaries were tethered to ropes pegged along the ground. "We shall rest here," the sheik said politely.

She made no comment and rode forward, trying to find new courage for the new adventure, whatever it was. Palm trees grew near the hill and extended out into the desert beyond. At the flap of the largest tent she was invited to dismount, but to her chagrin she had to be lifted to the ground.

Then with the assistance of a girl who had now appeared she sank upon a divan in the tent and, with difficulty, relaxed her aching limbs. The girl brought water to drink and a bowl to bathe the dust from her face, then stood by as impassive as the riders who had brought her here.

Apparently Camilla was to be treated with politeness, for after a while the Bedouin girl brought a dish of lentil soup, a red pottage of the same recipe, probably, for which Esau sold his birthright. This did much to restore her mind and body. As she sipped the soup she asked questions, but the girl gave signs of incomprehension, her slow bovine gaze completing the conviction of ignorance and stupidity. Then, as if to atone for her mental deficiencies, she carefully arranged the pillows on the divan and by childish pantomime suggested that Camilla should go to sleep.

And now while she tried to think of poor Josie, Janet and Mrs. Williamson, and to wonder what might be done to help them, she sank back in utter exhaustion. Poor Slim! He was in her last waking thought. Slim had been the cause of the bloodshed and had paid heavily for his impulse.

It was quite dark when she awoke, dark and cool. She pulled the silken robe over her and wondered how long she had been asleep; then remembered that it didn't really matter what time it was. Of course, escape was impossible and even if she had ever considered it, the distant sounds that now came to her—the sharp yelps from a pack of jackals fighting over a dead animal somewhere, the howl of a wolf or the distant wailing laugh of hyenas—would soon have driven the thought of escape from her head. But after a while these sounds diminished, became a part of the night itself, and with the moaning of the wind, the quivering of the tent flaps made a desert symphony that soothed her to sleep again.

In the morning the Bedouin girl, whose name Camilla never learned, came into the tent with Camilla's dressing case, a larger basin of water, towels and soap, and placed them on a table. And when she had bathed and taken coffee, Camilla found a cigarette and smoked. As she did so, her mind clearing rapidly, the thought of Hassan came to her again. Hassan and not Ronnie. Hassan more ominous than ever after what had happened. Who else but Hassan would have selected her from among her companions and brought her here into this far-off place? She remembered with clear comprehension the slow smile of her captor when the name of Hassan Isar had been mentioned. Hassan had planned this abduction, just as he had planned the conspiracy against Ronnie. She was sure of it now and she was frightened. Her insecurity and disloyalty to Hassan now came to haunt her.

Whatever Hassan's sins against Ronnie, he had committed none against Camilla. From the beginning he would have done anything she asked. She had betrayed him again, and again, and now her transgressions were finding her out. If Hassan had made her a prisoner she had little to hope for, and she was willing to admit that whatever happened to her would be nothing less than she deserved. Ronnie had said that Hassan was politically powerful in this country; otherwise, she now realized, his men would not have dared to hold up Michael's bus and kill Slim.

Just after sunset there was a sound of a rifle shot in the distance, an answering shot nearby, and an immediate commotion outside. The Bedouin girl rushed from the kitchen and the brigand who had captured Camilla yesterday passed before the flap of the tent in the sunlight and leaped on his horse. She wanted to run outside, but the Bedouin girl interposed, pointing to a camp chair that she had brought forward to the table. She gave a series of grunts which Camilla interpreted to mean that she was not permitted to leave the tent.

And yet in spite of her knowledge that she had brought all this upon herself she could not feel that Hassan would dare molest her on his own terms. Wasn't the reason why he preferred her because she could deceive him as she had always done? Wasn't this abduction merely his own way of making their caravan into the desert an accomplished fact in spite of her opposition?

His entrance at the flap of the tent was not in the least alarming. "Of course you know that if it hadn't been for your friend Slim, nothing would have happened yesterday."

His voice was deep but mild and she gained courage. "Nothing, of course," she said, "but the holdup of an American bus and the abduction of an American girl traveling in it."

"Granted. I intended to bring you here no matter what happened."

"And how are you going to answer for it?"

"I don't intend to answer at all. I'm not supposed to know anything about the holdup or about you."

"My government will have a word to say when it knows the truth."

"Who will tell?"

"Dr. Williamson, Torelli, Janet, Josie—"

"And how will they learn that I had anything to do with it?"

"I will tell them after you let me go."

He laughed jovially. Apparently he had determined to get as much pleasure out of the situation as possible. "Come, Camilla," he said. "Let's wait and quarrel after dinner. I hope the meal will be a good one." He clapped his hands three times and a tall Nubian appeared wearing the linen cap of a chef. He bowed as Hassan spoke and then the Bedouin girl returned, setting the table with a fine linen cloth and proper silver and porcelain furnishings.

"I think you'll be glad to have good news of your friends," Hassan said. "The great adventure of your friend Michael having ended in disaster, he thought it best to return to Damascus. He was not badly hurt, just a bullet through the flesh of his shoulder. Torelli drove, I'm told, and managed very well. Your cousin Josie was worried about you, of course, and I have no way of reassuring her. Miss Priestly is very happy to be back at the hotel with Torelli, and Kitty Trimble is on her way to Beirut."

"And you think you can keep a story like this quiet?"

"It will be a nine days' wonder and then forgotten."

"Not with the body of Slim as evidence?"

"There will be no body of Slim," he said. "When there's no body there's no crime. They tell me it was Slim who made the trouble. He'll make no more."

She sat silent, wondering how she could have tolerated Hassan for so long. He went out to bathe his face and hands, leaving her in a misery of uncertainty. There now seemed no hope for her in any direction—none of her old weapons would do. She was done—finished—

W. R. Winkler of Boone, local Oldsmobile dealer, and members of his sales staff, returned yesterday following a preview of the new Oldsmobile B-44. Factory executives from Lansing, Mich., assisted by zone officials, conducted the meeting in Charlotte. Details of the Oldsmobile's sales and advertising plans, as well as company policies for the coming model year, were outlined to the retail selling organization.

"Motorists are promised the biggest surprise in the history of the automobile business when they view the new Oldsmobile B-44," Mr. Winkler asserted. "October 5 has been scheduled as the official announcement date for Oldsmobile, and on that day the product that has been in the development stages for the past year will be unveiled nationally," he added. "Regardless of any existing opinions pertaining to inferior quality in the 1942 automobiles, Oldsmobile will introduce three lines of cars that are definitely better looking, better lasting and better built than any cars in the 44 year history of the company."

Questioned regarding the Oldsmobile B-44, Mr. Winkler stated that advancements such as new double duty bumpers, heavier frame, more fire power in the engines, and larger braking areas, place more emphasis than ever on ruggedness and dependability.

Hydra-matic drive, the revolutionary feature introduced by Oldsmobile two years ago, which eliminates the clutch pedal and all shifting gears, will be offered as optional equipment. Factory officials estimate that due to the ease with which hydra-matic drive is operated and the contribution it makes to safer motoring, the percentage of Oldsmobiles equipped with this feature will be substantially increased during 1942. More than 130,000

Oldsmobiles with hydra-matic drive are now in daily service, it was announced.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATION

ONE LINE OF DEFENSE THAT Must REMAIN IMPREGNABLE

Of vital importance to the South's security is the dependability of its far-reaching telephone lines.

On their constantly maintained efficiency depends continuity and flexibility of communication between military, industrial, and civilian forces necessary to the nation's defense.

In this crisis, Southern Bell is faced with the three-fold task of giving "all-out" service to defense, industry, and the public—a task requiring every ounce of its resources.

In most cities and towns in the nine southern states we serve, the demand upon our services is without precedent. In many of these places, mass troop and civilian concentrations, in addition to increased industrial demands, have made the continuation of normal telephone service difficult.

In these critical times, telephone workers ask your cooperation and appreciative understanding of the problems which confront them, knowing that you, too, are "all-out" for defense—that it is our common problem to keep telephone lines of defense impregnable.
