is located not far above this city on the lordly Hudson River which Irving made famous in his writings. His home has been reproduced by the Rockefeller and is authentic. The beloved author himself rightfully called it his "elegant little snuggery" and a visit to it fully conforms this description. First into his comfortable study, where are his original desk, chair and shawl with which he covered his shoulders, and where those delightful characters, Rip Van Winkle and Ichabod Crane were "born"; then into the colorful dining room, picturesque kitchen and on upstairs to snug bedrooms whose windows look out upon the peaceful river. Here Washington Irving lived a happy, distinguished and sometimes and life, unmarried, with his brother and five nieces. Toward the end of his life in 1858, he wrote fittingly: "I am living most cozily and delighted in this dear, bright little house, which I have fitted up to my own humor. Everything goes on cheerily in my little household and I would not exchange the cottage for any chateau in Christendom."
