

PRICE PARK CAMPERS.—Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Adams and grandson, Nikki take it easy after supper on their camp site at Price camping grounds, near Blowing Rock Saturday. From Enka, the three were nearing the end of a week there, and were bemoaning the fact they could only spend one week camping at the park this year. Last year they spent two weeks. The lower camping area or older part of the grounds was opened last month to campers, and the upper grounds were opened Saturday by Park Rangers. There are a total of 106 camping and trailer sites in the park, and campers were moving into both areas Saturday night. Last year only 35 sites were available. Experienced campers, Mr. and Mrs. Adams said the Price camp is the "nicest and prettiest" they have ever camped in, and their camping experiences have carried them as far as South Dakota and Wyoming.—Staff photo Joe Minor.

is rolling down the tracks to share the load.

Many adults, and children, too, have arrived at Tweetsieville expecting to see a miniature railroad, similar to those used in amusement parks. They are astonished to find Tweetsie is a genuine, full-sized engine, though its tracks are a bit closer together than the standard used for today's trains.

But all have been thrilled when the train is attacked by Indians at Deadman's Gulch and later is held up by outlaws to make off with the Wells Fargo gold shipment. Outlaws and Indians are college students but their make-up is so realistic that many youngsters rip at the Indians' clothing and shoot at them with cap pistols.

Success of Tweetsie as a national attraction has caused Robbins to build another narrow-gauge line, this one at Gatlinburg, Tenn., and named "The Rebel."

Horn Rehearsals

the past seasons are again cast in their favorite roles. Bill Ross, a leading member of the cast since the play's beginning, will again be seen in the role of Dr. Geoffrey Stuart. Charles Ellledge, one of the best loved and certainly the most well remembered person in the play, will continue his dual roles as play narrator and as the unforgettable Preacher Sims.

Everyone currently working on this year's "Horn in the West" agree that a warm and exciting production is in store for viewers this summer. Advance ticket sales are already the highest in the history of the drama.
