Kennedy Says UNICEF Example Civic Concern

What President Kennedy has described as "an outstanding example of active citizen concern in the work of the United Nations Children's Fund" started in a humble, inconspicuous way—as so many great human traditions will. A few children decided that this year on Halloween, rather than candy and apples they would like to collect pennies—small coins that might help other children in need in other parts of the world. They did, and sent about $36 to UNICEF. The years was 1950. A decade later, on October 31, 1960, over two and a half million American boys and girls in some 11,000 communities Trick or Treated for UNICEF, and the "treats" they received totaled $1,750,000. Our distant ancestors' world had witnessed a first step away from the dark world when Halloween began to lose its most sinister connotations. For times well beyond the historian's grasp, man's frights and fears had found a vivid expression once a year, on a night when witches and warlocks, ghosts and all forces of evil were expected to break whatever feeble bonds usually restrained them and to roam freely at large. Our children also know how much more remains to be done. Only one in ten of the 550 million boys and girls who are in need of help is being reached through UNICEF-assisted programs, and the world's child population increases every year. As President Kennedy put it, "The work of UNICEF must be pursued indefatigably and with undiminished support. The problems of hunger, education and child welfare are as widespread today as in the past. The best attack on these problems lies precisely in the kind of cooperative effort which characterizes UNICEF. I am confident that UNICEF will remain a foremost concern to all Americans because it engages both the idealist zeal and practical
