Social Security Is Help To Dead Farmer's Family

A farmer near Zionville died the other day. He left a young widow and one teen-age daughter. This man had sufficient insurance to bury him, but little else.

They had farmed-rented land and lived in a rented house. The survivors will have to be assisted by other relatives for a while. But there will be some assured income to the family in the form of Social Security payments. The farmer had filed tax returns starting with 1956 when sharecroppers were first covered by the Social Security law. He worked several acres and sold his crops for good money. But, after expenses, sometimes he had a loss, or nearly so.

In the low income years, however, he elected to pay Social Security tax on a part of his total income. For example, the deceased received, in an average year, $2,000.00 for his crops. After expenses he would clear about $700.00.

Because his gross receipts were over $1800.00 he could pay Social Security tax on $1200.00. Three of his five years on record were for this amount.

In figuring the survivor's benefits it was found that the mother and child are entitled to $129.00 a month until the child is 18 years old. The mother will also receive a small lump-sum payment. This is not a lot of money, but it is assured.

It all came about because the farmer filed timely tax returns based on his earnings. Are you reporting your farm income to get the credit you need? If you are not, you are not receiving the Social Security protection probably due you and your family. To get this protection, your earnings have to be reported.

If you have any questions about this, your local Social Security office or representative, and your Internal Revenue office will be glad to discuss them with you.

Social Security credit can mean money—monthly payments when old-age, death or total disability occur.

Know The Weather

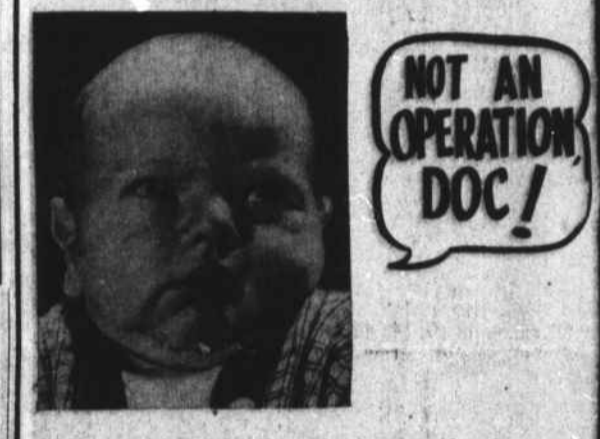

By E. H. SIMS

Has this winter's weather—thus far—seemed to support the theory that we are experiencing a trend back to colder winters?

Yes, the winter temperatures this season have been lower than the average in recent years, although the winter isn't over and the complete seasonal average is not yet determined.

Sustained cold weather systems from the polar regions this winter have been impressive in behalf of the argument that we are experiencing a reversal of the trend of some forty years toward warmer and warmer winters.

If this winter's tentative clues are proven accurate in future years, in the middle '60's the nation will be experiencing winters of severity more comparable to those experienced just before the turn of the century.

TRADE AT HOME

ON THE TEST BAN
The United States expect to know within the next few weeks whether there is a possibility of getting a serious agreement with Russia on a nuclear weapons test ban.
Results of the meeting in Moscow of United States Ambassador Foy D. Kohler and the Soviet leader may reveal further agreement.
