Nation Is Facing Cotton Shortage

National Carryover By August 1 Only 2.6 Million Bales

It's more profitable to make 10 bales of cotton on 10 acres than to make 10 bales on 20 acres.

So say the specialists of the State College Extension Service, who this week advised Tar Heel growers to plant all the cotton they can care for properly in 1951, but no more. This suggestion is contained in "North Carolina's Agricultural Outlook for 1951" which was recently released. The publication is based on data supplied by the U. S. Department of Agriculture's Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

The national carryover of cotton by August 1 is expected to be only 2.6 million bales, compared with a "normal" carryover of 4.3 million bales. If exports had not been limited, the carryover would be estimated at less than 0.7 million bales.

North Carolina's cotton production for 1950 is estimated at 180,000 bales, compared with 490,000 in 1949. The small crop was due to reduction in acreage, unfavorable weather during July, and disastrous insect attacks. The estimated yield per acre for 1950 is only 147 pounds, compared with a 10-year average of 373 pounds.

To meet the expected cotton shortage, Tar Heel growers are advised by the Extension Service to:

Secure supplies of good planting seed adapted to your area. Do this now.

Order insecticides when fertilizer is ordered.

Follow recommended practices in fertilizing, poisoning, defoliating, harvesting, and marketing.

Follow good farm management practices, working your increased acreage into your over-all program in the most profitable way.

Apply poisons if needed to control boll weevil. Growers who applied poisons as recommended in 1950 averaged better than a bale to the acre on their entire acreage.
