Make Best Use Of Electric Power

This is an appropriate time for North Carolina's rural families to check on how efficiently they are using electricity to help them with farm and home chores, says David S. Weaver, secretary of the North Carolina Rural Electrification Authority and director of the Extension Service.

Weaver, who served as principal agricultural engineer with REA in 1936, made this statement while calling attention to the 20th anniversary of the Rural Electrification Administration on May 11. REA has helped make electricity available to 177,189 consumers over REA-financed lines in rural areas of North Carolina.

The U. S. Department of Agriculture reports that 96.9 per cent of Tar Heel farms have electric service today, compared with only 3.2 per cent in 1935, the year REA was established.

Weaver emphasizes that to get the maximum benefit from electric service, farm families should make sure their electric appliances are in good repair and they are using them to the best advantage. Proper care helps avoid big repair bills and helps assure that the equipment won't break down when it is needed most. It is also important that farm homes and buildings are adequately wired to carry the load needed to operate all the farm equipment.

"Overloaded wires result in poor equipment performance, wasted power, higher electric bills, and blown-out fuses, besides creating a hazard," Weaver said.

Recent reports from REA show that from the beginning of its program up to January 1, 1955, REA had lent $97,288,843 to 33 cooperatives and five other borrowers in North Carolina for building electric facilities. When all the construction authorized in these loans is completed, the facilities will provide electric service to an estimated 190,290 consumers.
