

SENATOR SAM ERVIN SAYS

Washington—It appears to me that Congress must legislate to prevent the abuse of union funds by unscrupulous persons charged with the responsibility of handling these funds. This has been shown by our committee's investigation of the Teamsters Union.

Not For Revenge
I have listened to the story of Dave Beck's record as head of the Teamsters. It is an incredible record. Our Committee's investigation of Beck has produced over 50 allegations of irregularities.

With this record, along with the other matters to be investigated, perhaps this inquiry will cause Congress to properly legislate to straighten out this alarming condition. Congress should carefully weigh the problem but should not legislate in any spirit of revenge. The main thing is the protection of the rank and file worker against abuse from corrupt union leaders, and also corrupt management in this field.

Congress Rolling
Congress is rolling along rapidly on its work schedule. Appropriations have made the headlines during recent days. The Senate Appropriations Committee is manifesting a strong inclination to cut the budget, and the first test of this action on the floor indicated that the overwhelming majority of the Senate is of the same mind. There has been no indication up to now that the President's appeal to the people to support his record-breaking budget is taking effect. Usually, following a major address of this nature, I receive numerous telegrams asking that I support the President. This time I received only one telegram to support his position. On the other hand, there were many messages from North Carolinians requesting me to continue to help cut the budget.

Not Dead
In my report last week I made note of the action by the House to eliminate $14 million for the flood insurance program. I said that this was a meaningful program to North Carolina due to the hurricane disasters. The Senate Appropriations Committee last week restored the $14 million. Whether it will survive floor action and conferees is uncertain, but the issue is not entirely dead at the moment.

Savings Asked
Recommendations have been made by a Senate group as a result of careful study of the foreign aid program. The group asks that savings be carried out and that far-reaching changes in the concept and operations of the programs be made. I was impressed with the recommendation that future legislation should make clear that distinction of purpose and function between military aid, defense support aid, technical assistance and economic aid.

Prize Winning World Peace Essay

We have not known this kind of peace since the end of World War II. The reason we have not known such a peace is that, by an accident of history, two great sources of disturbance, independent in origin, were artificially married in what appeared to be an assault on the law and order of international affairs. The first of these sources was the seething unrest of that half of the globe emerging from colonial control and tutelage, bitter and angry at the white men of the West, seeking by every means and with any ally to gain the equality and independence to which it is entitled.

The second source of disturbance was the calculated, persistent, relentless determination of the leaders of Communist Russia to force their system on other nations, whether those nations wanted it or not, by any means, fair or foul.

The marriage of these two forces in the world, a marriage skillfully and artfully pursued by the leaders of the Kremlin, has not once, but many times, brought the world uncomfortably close to World War III.

Peace is everyone's concern. But it must be more than just a concern. In this atomic age when the stakes for all mankind are high, peace must be everyone's business—an integral part of your daily thought and your activity and your prayers.

Over and over again, people ask of themselves and others, "But what can I do for peace?"

Consider deeply the ideas of Harold E. Stassen on working toward peace.

First, each of us can study and understand the profound facts which govern this new nuclear age in which we are living.

Second, through letters, discussion, civic meetings each of us can share our understanding with others.

Third, each of us can choose a private overseas project, through church, or club, or labor union, as a particular and personal sharing of American resources in helping others to help themselves.

Fourth, each of us can show hospitality to foreigners—to the students, scientists, farmers, technicians, and trainees visiting the United States under our technical cooperation and exchange programs, both government-sponsored and private.

And, finally, each of us can pray for peace, for help in searching out the ways in which peace can be realized, and for continuing faith that peace can be achieved.

Basically, all Americans have the same dream—a dream of peace. Odd, how the dreams of people become so real, so alive, that they themselves become that dream. Somewhere a scientifically unbiased transformation takes place, the inanimate is transferred to the animate and thus lives. We Americans are living examples of that incredible transformation—synono-mously we are thought of in connection with peace; thus the burden falls directly on us, on each one of us individually. Out of the chaos and confusion of this world, we are indebted to ourselves as to whether we are a part of the answer or a part of the problem.

World peace seems unattainable at the present time—and it will always seem so unless we look to ourselves for that answer. By this word "ourselves," I do not mean merely we Americans but people the world over. It is for the benefit of people that we want peace, thus it is reasonable to assume that from the people must come the beginning and in time the peace.

There is no definite answer to this riddle of world peace. Peace is achieved, not given, it is won, but not stolen, and desired but not attained merely through that emotion.

I, as you, do not know the answer to this puzzle confronting the world; thus we must all join together and look to ourselves for the answer and perhaps, in time, our mutual, joint effort will not go unrewarded and we, the dream, shall grow and prosper and multiply in the radiating warmth and cleanness of that sunlight which World Peace can shine so brightly upon us.
