

Senator Sam J. Ervin Says

WASHINGTON — A lagging business economy and rising unemployment rates in this country have focused attention once more upon our foreign trade policies and the special problem relating to textiles and apparel-producing industries.

The basic problem is that our textile and apparel producers are faced with greater costs than their overseas competitors who are flooding our domestic markets with low-cost fabrics and garments. The import issue has not been resolved because a battle has raged for years in this country between those who believe in reasonable protection for American textiles and those who favor free trade.

Consequently, our government has been indecisive in its efforts to protect the domestic textile industry and foreign nations have taken advantage of this situation.

North Carolina has an immense stake in this problem. Textile and apparel industries constitute about 40 per cent of our industrial force. These industries have more than 1,700 plants in our state. They employ more than 333,000 of our citizens with an annual payroll exceeding $1.5 billion.

Our domestic textile and apparel products problems originated shortly after World War II ended when the Japanese greatly increased their capacity to produce such goods. The U. S. soon became the largest open market for these products in the world. Thereafter, many other nations with an abundant cheap labor supply and governmental assistance rapidly expanded their exports to this country of cotton, wool and synthetic products.

Early in the Kennedy administration, it became apparent that something had to be done to remedy this threat to our domestic textile industry.

On May 2, 1961, President Kennedy proposed a seven-point textile program. Negotiations between our country and a number of other nations led to the 1962 Long Term Cotton Textile Arrangement which for a time aided our domestic textile markets.

As the 1970's begin, however, it is again apparent that the volume of foreign-made textiles and apparel entering this country is growing so rapidly that much of the domestic demand for these goods is being supplied by imports. This has caused the Nixon administration to seek some solution to preserve our domestic textile industry.

The administration is presently engaged in negotiations with the Japanese to work out a voluntary agreement regulating imports of apparel and textile man-made and woolen fibers. The President has indicated that he believes that the flow of textile and apparel imports constitutes a special problem for this country. Thus far these negotiations have accomplished virtually nothing, because the Japanese are insisting that any agreement cover only that damage to our domestic textile industry be "proved" by a joint Japanese-American body. This condition is unacceptable. Our country should determine for itself whether American jobs are endangered and whether damage is being done to our textile and apparel industries.

Under the circumstances, it seems to me that the best means of achieving a solution to this problem is to use the Trade Act, HR 14870, as the vehicle for establishing a textile apparel orderly marketing system. The House Ways and Means Committee will be considering this measure soon, and if our negotiators have made no further progress with the Japanese by early May, I am hopeful that the committee will report out a bill setting import quotas on textile products.

NO GREATER LOVE

By MARY CAYTON

The blood, the blood, the precious blood
My Saviour shed on Calvary,
The blood that flowed down from that cross
To save a sinner such as me.

The pain, the pain, the awful pain
He bore to set me free,
How can I help but love Him,
He's done so much for me.

The shame, the shame He had to bear
To save the world from sin;
We surely cannot be ashamed
Of a Saviour such as Him.

The love, the love, no greater love
Could anyone have I know;
He gave His life on Calvary
Because He loved us so.

My sins, my sins, my many sins,
His blood has washed away, I know;
It has the power to cleanse our souls,
And make them white as snow.

The thorns, the thorns, how sharp the thorns,
That pierced His loving brow,
He'll wear the crown of thorns no more,
He wears one of glory now.
