Grant Is Awarded

Integrated Energy Systems of Chapel Hill has been awarded a federal grant to install their automated wood burning system in two North Carolina schools. The funds come from the Department of Energy as part of a program to encourage small-scale renewable energy projects.

IES is a group of architects, engineers, and planners specializing in energy conservation and applications of alternate energy systems. Werner Martin, the inventor of the wood burning system has directed the testing and development efforts for the past year at the IES research facility and at the U. S. Environmental Protection Agency. The test results show that the burner is over 85 per cent efficient and that the air pollution is comparable to an arner.

IES is currently working for two schools who are interested in trying out the burner. The federal funds will pay for the installation and for fuel during testing. The equipment will remain at the school after the tests are complete.

A patent application has been submitted and the company hopes that the burner system will soon be commercially available. Other potential uses of the system are seen in crop drying, motels, laundries, and small industrial and commercial buildings.
