Bill To Focus On Decision-Making Process

Responsible decision making concerning food safety is the focus of proposed food safety amendments of 1981 now before Congress.

The legislation would allow scientific judgment to influence food safety decisions. A food additive would be deemed safe if it posed no significant health threat to humans. Thus, the bill would not require the banning of substances proven to pose inconsequential health risks.

The legislation would also empower the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) to allow the phase-out of a potentially harmful substance used in food rather than an outright ban on its use. Potentially hazardous food additives with a long history of use for which there were no substitutes would be placed in a special category, with their use being regulated according to their relative risks and benefits.

The new amendments would improve food safety decisions by authorizing referral of proposals to ban or limit substances and by requiring referral to expert scientific advisory panels. In the last twenty years a number of substances have been banned by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA). Recent familiar examples include cyclamates and saccharin, both artificial sweeteners and a coloring agent known as Red Dye No. 4. The FDA ban on saccharin, however, was overruled by a congressional moratorium in 1979 to allow time for further scientific experimentation.

Then there was the recent attempt to ban nitrites, commonly used to prevent botulism, a type of food poisoning. The FDA later admitted that nitrites were not known to be a direct cause of cancer.

Regulatory decisions, such as the on-again, off-again ban on nitrite, have caused confusion. The resulting perception of the public is that government decisions made in the name of safety may not be in their best interest.

If approved, the proposed food safety amendments would result in a more reasoned and scientific approach to food safety.

The phrase "the fourth estate," referring to journalists, was first used by Sir Edmund Burke during a speech made to the British Parliament, as he considered the various powers that be in the British government.
