Carolina Review

AGAIN ... In June of 1980, upcoming House Speaker Liston Ramsey said his main individual objective of the 1981 Legislature would be "to see that what money we have is spent wisely and that no unnecessary taxes are levied."

Ramsey went on to say that "necessarily, reapportionment of the Congressional Districts and the House and Senate Districts will be one of the more important things the members will have to deal with ..."

Thursday marks the beginning of the third episode of the 1981 session of the N. C. General Assembly. The episode and the session could possibly end on the same day, but then again it could go on for a few days more — or it could "temporarily adjourn" and come again some other day.

This third effort is aimed at finally resolving the redistricting dilemma that Ramsey spoke of almost 16 months ago.

Redistricting is a chore that the lawmakers should have been aware of, if not when Ramsey was, then at least since the first day of the first session of the 1981 General Assembly back in January.

Unfortunately, the House and Senate membership did not seriously consider the various possibilities for redistricting until toward the end of that first episode. More unfortunate is the fact that the membership by that time were also busy raising the gasoline tax, putting off state employee raises, and typing up loose ends in hopes of getting home for the July 4th festivities.

The lawmakers came back earlier this month to finish spending the money that Ramsey spoke of and now they are back to re-finish the reapportionment.

To their credit, the lawmakers didn't really know they weren't already finished with redistricting. With a lot of talk and consternation, but with relative ease, both the Senate and House agreed on plans for Congressional reapportionment and for their respective bodies.

The Congressional reapportionment plan will apparently fly. The House and Senate plans apparently won't.

The failure of the plans is a result of a court challenge by the NAACP over the "one man, one vote" doctrine. The court challenge won't go anywhere since the state Justice department after looking over the plans, agreed with the NAACP and decided that the Senate and House plans could not be successfully defended. The lawyers in the Justice Department suggested that the legislators try again.

A similar challenge of Congressional reapportionment can be defended say the lawyers.

So now the legislators gather in Raleigh again this week to create passable "one man, one vote" schemes for the House and Senate Districts.

A "normal" deviation of population from district to district has been historically set by the federal judiciary at 10 per cent. The highest deviation ever approved by the federal courts, according to attorneys for the Justice Department, is 16 per cent.

The original House plan included a deviation of 23.6 per cent and the Senate a 22.7 per cent deviation. That means some legislators might represent over 20 per cent more people than others.

The plans drafted during the committee hearings last week showed deviations of 10.29 for the House and 12.98 per cent for the Senate.

As evidenced by the commotion caused last week in preliminary committee hearings, the final decisions won't be easy. There are some very irritated legislators who have promised to fight the new committee plans over the effects negative on their own districts.

And since the new recommended plans don't even meet the standards suggested by the Justice Department for smooth sailing, the irritated lawmakers could have a point.

The question is, with all of the information available for so long, why all of this, all of a sudden?

Seminar Scheduled

Coastal Institute Associates, a division of Neuse Mental Health Center, New Bern and Morehead City, will be sponsoring a seminar, Leadership Skills For Professional Women, November 12-13, at the Ramada Inn in Atlantic Beach.

State Sen. Helen Rhyne Marvin from the 25th District will give the keynote speech, "That Was No Lady, That Was My Boss".

The seminar will focus on specific leadership skills - situational leadership, time management, team building, assertiveness, and dressing for success. The cost is $115 per person which includes registration fee, program materials, refreshment breaks and two meals. Registration deadline is November 6, 1981.
