Working Has Little Effect

GREENVILLE — Whether or not a child's mother works outside the home has no effect upon a child's performance in school, say two East Carolina University education researchers. Dr. Robert Brown, a professor in the ECU School of Education, and graduate education student Kristle Flesham of Morehead City studied a group of fifth graders at the John Small Elementary School in Washington, and confirmed what similar research in other areas has indicated — a mother's work, by choice or necessity, will not hinder children's scholastic achievement. "Increasingly, when faced with the current economic conditions, families have attempted to improve their financial position by the mother's working outside the home," Brown says. "Also many mothers choose to work and develop careers of their own. "Parents have often wondered if there were some sort of detrimental effect on the child's schoolwork, which, in part, might be attributed to the mother's outside employment."

To test this possibility, Brown and Flesham selected a random group of 60 fifth grade students, half with mothers who worked outside the home and half with mothers who did not. The subjects' scores on the California Achievement Test were "no significantly different according to established statistical procedures," Brown reported. The researchers were unable to control accurately such factors as the parents' educational levels or the students' IQ scores, but since the group was systematically randomized, these differences were not significant. A wide range of parental educational levels and pupil IQ was evident in both groups. "Originally, 102 fifth graders were selected," Brown said. "However, only 30 students had nonworking mothers, so we have to limit our survey to 60 students — half with working mothers and half with nonworking mothers. "The high percentage of working mothers among the parents of the original group indicates that a working mother is definitely the norm in Washington." The conclusion of the Brown-Flesham study — that a mother's outside employment does not affect her child's school achievement — is the same as other recent studies done throughout the nation, using preschool and school children of various age groups. Brown has collaborated on previous research projects regarding home and family influences upon children's school achievement. Among these have been studies of the effects of absent fathers on the achievement of rural black children and a comparison study of success levels of high school seniors from one- and two-parent homes.
