Veeco Reports Costs Down

Virginia Electric and Power Company was the only company among 20 of the nation's largest utilities to experience a decline in the average cost of electricity during the first nine months of 1981.

Veeco's average cost of electricity was 5.14 cents per kilowatt-hour during the first three quarters of 1981, 1.5 per cent less than its average cost of electricity during 1980.

Among the other 19 utilities the smallest increase was 4.6 per cent and the largest 28.3 per cent.

Veeco's average cost of electricity during the first nine months of 1981 was also 12 per cent less than the combined average cost of 5.87 cents per kilowatt-hour for the other 19 utilities. Veeco's cost was less than that of 12 utilities and higher than seven.

Farming Proves Unsuccessful

Some of America's largest corporations have learned that farming is not always a profitable business.

A decade ago several corporations, seeing only easy money from raising prices and dire predictions of a world food shortage, leaped into farming, mostly in California. They discovered they were not immune to the weather, labor, market uncertainty and pest problems that afflict all farmers.

A recent Wall Street Journal article chronicled corporate farming's failures and success and noted that of 25 publicly traded nonagricultural firms involved in farming 10 years ago, only seven are still at it.

Companies failed at farming, according to the article, because of ignorance about farming and impatience for profits. Corporations still involved in farming have accepted that farming is a risky business and see it as a long-term investment.

Not the least of corporate farms' problems was Cesar Chavez's United Farm Workers. During the 1970's, the union attempted to organize workers at all the California corporate farms and drove one company to sign a contract with out of business. The company "lost control" of its operation when its union workers protested for changes with work slowdowns and refusals to work.

After suffering heavy losses and having to destroy fields of asparagus, the company withdrew from farming.

Top management found out the hard way that corporate tactics can't be applied to agriculture. One farm manager said, "After explaining the effects of drought, bugs and frost on crops, it's tough to explain a beautiful crop and no market to sell it in because everyone else produced a beauty too."

Little Known Facts

Musicians have many eccentricities. For example, Haydn could write music on clean white paper only. Mozart composed while playing billiards. Rossini composed most of his music while he was drunk, and Wagner found it easiest to compose when he was dressed up in historical costumes.
