INSIGHT INTO EYESIGHT

"A" For Eye Help

About 95 per cent of all children's eye problems can be corrected today either in whole or in part. That's a "straight A" in anyone's book.

The most common problems are those affecting the ability to see clearly and sharply. Myopia (near-sightedness) causes near objects to be seen more clearly than objects at a distance. With hyperopia (far sightedness) objects are seen more clearly at a distance, but close-up objects are sometimes blurred and difficult to bring into focus. A stigmatism can cause objects to be distorted and will not allow all portions of an object to be seen in focus at one time. These are relatively straightforward vision problems to identify through an eye examination and to correct if needed.

Unfortunately, you probably won't hear about these problems from children. If they see chalkboards or book pages as blurs, they'll assume everyone does. Since 80 per cent of learning is through vision, give your child a head start with an eye examination BEFORE entering school. That will give you an "A" for effort whether your child's vision needs help or not.

Cosmetic Contouring

Dentistry has several techniques it can use to improve the appearance of the teeth. One of these, cosmetic contouring, is one of the most dramatic yet simplest and least expensive ways of improving a smile. It involves the reshaping of teeth to make them more esthetically appealing.

A patient, for example, may have long pointed canines (eye teeth) that distort the smile. By simply rounding off the pointed edges, the smile becomes balanced and normal. The chewing edges of a woman's teeth may wear down and become jagged and square. Smoothing and rounding them will restore the softness and femininity to her smile.

Crowns or caps are another way to contour teeth. Before restorations are designed, it is important for the dentist to get an overview of the mouth. Teeth that are extruded or crowded should be cosmetically contoured and the crowns then shaped to conform to a more esthetic environment.

Shaping a crown properly is paramount to a pleasing appearance. The shape is what the eye notices first. If the patient has a corresponding natural tooth, duplicating that shape gives the best results.
