DECISIONS? In Washington, Congress and the president are sparring over how to put together a federal budget. No one wants to make the hard decisions that seemingly are required, and reports hit the papers last week that even the negotiations had broken down.

In turn, the president announced he was going over the heads of the Congress (where even some of his Republican stalwarts are balking at his proposed budget).

The president has decided to take his case to the people. Unfortunately, the president seems instead to be trying to obscure his budgetary and deficit troubles by introducing proposals for constitutional amendments on school prayer and a balanced federal budget. He also announced his renewed support for an anti-busing bill sponsored by Sen. Jesse Helms.

The Argentine Junta has been accused of invading the Falkland Islands as a diversion for the populace from their woeful economic problems.

For President Reagan to initiate discussions over a balanced budget amendment, at a time when he is proposing record federal deficits, hints broadly at diversion. Reagan opponents in the Democratic Party are scratching their heads wondering if Reagan's tactic will work. On the other hand, in Raleigh, hard decisions are being made.

Gov. Jim Hunt announced last Friday that he would not present the proposed $300-million water and sewer bond referendum to the voters in the June 29 primary vote.

There must have been some disappointment for the governor in making the decision since he had lobbied hard for the bond issue in the winter session of the General Assembly. And the legislators had responded, authorizing him to set the referendum date at his discretion.

In announcing his decision not to place the bonds on the ballot in June, Hunt explained that "bond issues should be voted on in as near normal times as possible—and clearly, these are not normal times."

But Hunt spokesman Gary Pearce was more succinct. "The people are likely to say no at this time," Pearce said.

"People are just real nervous right now with the economy like it is...the budget in Washington and the interest rates. There is a feeling that the bottom might drop out—that they may lose their job tomorrow," Pearce said.

According to Hunt, a negative vote on the water and sewer bonds might be disastrous. "We have to have the bond issue," he said, "(because) there are 149 municipalities in North Carolina who can not add a new industry or even a new home (because of sewer and water liabilities).

Pearce said the governor is deeping his options open for inserting the referendum onto the ballot in the November general election.

ANOTHER...Look for another hard decision soon, this time from the governor and the Legislature. The legislators must find approximately $110-million in funding to continue the 5 per cent pay raise for teachers and other state employees granted last year.

Gov. Hunt will probably recommend a freeze on the merit increases for state employees and the teacher salary steps, thus allowing a continuance of the 5 per cent increase for everybody and avoiding any mass layoffs.
