A Child's Chewing Habits

Have you ever watched the way your child chews his food? Does he chew his food in a straight up and down motion or is the motion "off side"? A child's chewing habits are an important clue to the alignment of his teeth. If they are not properly aligned, he may be compensating for this by developing chewing habits that can cause serious dental problems.

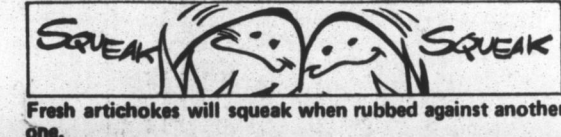

Malocclusion, for example, is the irregular alignment of teeth and improper meshing of the teeth during chewing. This dental problem may be the result of poor jaw relationships and improper muscle action. When the condition becomes severe it may cause deformation of the jaw and face. It can also have an adverse effect on the teeth. When a child's teeth are out of alignment, this is not only interferes with good chewing habits, it can also cause teeth to become crooked and more susceptible to decay.

Dental care should begin at the earliest possible age to protect your child's dental health. Poor chewing habits may be a sign he has a dental problem that needs correcting.

New Long-Wear Contacts

Recently, there has been a breakthrough in the design of soft contacts. These can be worn continuously for up to two weeks, depending upon the individual. They are about as different from the previous generation of soft contacts as contacts are from spectacles. How do they work?

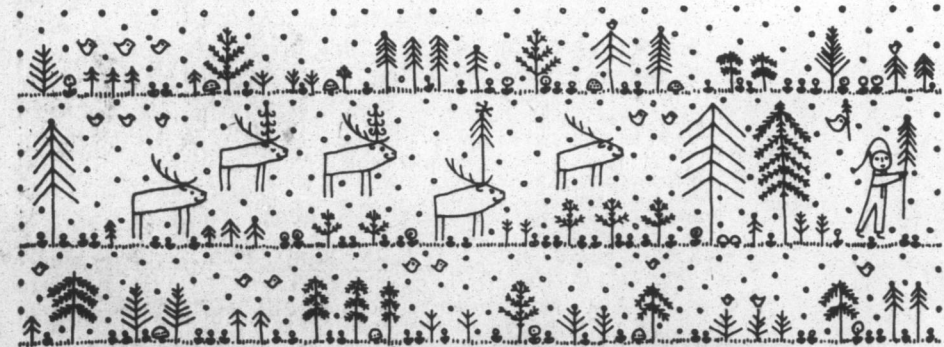

The key element is oxygen. For a soft contact lens to work most effectively and provide the maximum of comfort, it must allow oxygen to reach the eye. This involves the water content of the lens and the number of oxygen pathways which are provided. These newly designed lenses absorb considerably more water than earlier models, and thereby can provide superior oxygen transmission. This, in turn, means higher quality vision, meaning wearing comfort.

Is extended-wear for everyone? Because individual eyes vary, only your eye doctor can determine the type of vision correction that's best for you.
