Weyerhaeuser—Changes In Roles

Four Get New Roles

Four long-time Weyerhaeuser managers have assumed expanded roles and new responsibilities at Plymouth wood products, according to team coordinator Bob Andrews. The changes, effective immediately, are effectiveness and product flow.

Jim Wellborn, who joined the company at Mountain Pine, Arkansas in 1973, will assume responsibility for management of the sawmill in addition to his current duties at the scales and merchandiser.

Francis Russell, in the wood products group since 1968, who is currently responsible for grading, stacking and kiln drying of lumber at the sawmill will take on the added job of quality control for untreated lumber going to the treating plant.

Jim Collier has assumed responsibility for operation of the treated wood plant. He will continue to have responsibility for finishing and shipping of "white wood" or untreated lumber from the Plymouth sawmill. Collier joined Weyerhaeuser in 1979.

Allen Lunsford, who joined the company in 1973, will direct his attention to sourcing, that is, provision of raw material, to the treated wood plant and the supply of finished product for marketing. The overall aim is improved relationships with "white wood" suppliers and with sales organizations.

"We believe that these changes will make our sawmill, merchandiser and treated plant more effective, more profitable and prepare us to better meet the coming upturn in the market", said coordinator Andrews.

"It's interesting and significant that each of these team leaders was instrumental in the development of the background data that resulted in these new task oriented assignments", he concluded.

Vern Woolard Revisited
"In Eastern North Carolina terms, Vern Woolard would have to be called a 'shade tree development engineer'."

Woolard was being paid a heavy compliment by one of his peers just after his retirement at the end of 1962.

Woolard, according to Duzan and others, either built, developed or modified for Eastern North Carolina use, every significant piece of equipment used in Weyerhaeuser's wood handling and forestry operations.

"Vern Woolard was not an engineer by training", said land use supervisor DeWitt Darden, but if it had anything to do with metal and making machinery, he could do anything you asked. He was to our forestry operations what the good old boy car builders are to stock car racing."

Woolard joined Weyerhaeuser in December 1965 as supervisor of the then, brand new woods shop. From September of 1968 until his retirement December 31 last year, he was supervisor of the Equipment Development Task Force headquartered at the company seed orchard near Washington, N.C.

During that period, Vern Woolard turned cast-off chipper blades from the pulp mill and cast-off scraper blades from tractors into the region's first roller-chopper, a huge metal drum with cutting blades to grind up debris left after trees are harvested. He also made from scratch a mechanized tree planter which was used for several years before being discontinued in favor of hand-planting.

Woolard, despite his lack of formal training, brought a love for invention and innova-
