A Tribute To Murphy And Its People

The scenery of western North Carolina, especially within a radius of twenty-five miles around Murphy, is incomparable both as to the rugged grandeur of the mountains as well as to the bewitching serenity of its valleys.

The very names, borne by the creeks, rivers, and mountains, attest the charm of the primitive life that predominates. One finds, for instance, the Nantahala gorge, picturesque in every way, where cliffs are almost perpendicular, shutting out the sun most of the day.

Other Indian names of interest in this part of the country are Topton, Tomoth, Yaww-tadonuyi, a high mountain near Nantahala river, and Wachesa, a name derived from an old Cherokee Indian, and one sees "From the cliffside in the mountains. Roll a thousand little streams, laughing as they greet each other. Where the sunshine never beams. The gem of this section is Murphy, the little town that radiates among and about these mountains. It lies between two rivers, the Hiwassee and the Valley, the former spreading calmly and lazily across the country until it sends out a thousand scintillations as the summer sun touches its sparkling waves, while it journeys in and out among the mountains of Cherokee county, sweeping through the ferns and the "fondling grass".

In the private yards of Murphy are found flowers, ferns, and begonias, the luxurance of which would arrest the admiration and envy of the most successful florist, while rest for the mind and soul, and feast for the body can be found at the old "Dickey House", where every attention is given the fortunate guest.

Hospitality, characteristic of the mountaineers, is also found in Murphy where everyone is gracious to the "stranger within a strange land", this having been shown by the many courtesies extended me recently. So, in Murphy,

"The heart looks out on life, clear-eyed and finds it good."

TOO HOT TO EAT?—DRINK YOUR CALORIES

Scientists Find One Bottle of Coca-Cola Has Same Food Value as One Slice of White Bread

Here is a bit of summer information that comes out of scientific analyses recently made. It isn't expected to start the world on a hunger strike, but anything that bears on diet these days is important.

In one bottle of Coca-Cola, science finds, there are 74.6 calories, essential food units. In the ordinary slice of white bread there are approximately 75 calories. And, more shame to the hen, there are only 66 calories in an egg. A medium-size orange will have 87 calories and it only takes 75 calories to "keep the doctor away"—if you depend on the proverbial apple.

"These figures are interesting," says C. K. Hoover, Manager of the Murphy, N. C., Coca-Cola Bottling Company. "The calories, of course, are contained in the pure sugar used in Coca-Cola syrup. But Coca-Cola is made to quench thirst, not as a food. It must be a great thirst quencher for it has reached a sale of 7,000,000 drinks a day."—Adv.

DIPPING INTO SCIENCE

Rubber

The usefulness of rubber was discovered by natives of South America hundreds of years ago, although it was not introduced into Europe until 1820, where it sold for $1.50 an inch. Its real value was not realized until Charles Goodrich, an American, perfected the process of making it into a hard substance by adding to it heated sulphur. (© 1926, Western Newspaper Union.)
