HAIR BLEACHING A DANGEROUS PRACTICE

"Dear Miss Flo: Please tell me what to do to keep my hair from getting darker. It is bobbed, naturally curly, and somewhat oily. I have been using lemon after a shampoo, but it does not keep my hair light. Everybody says I should have my hair bleached, as I have a naturally fair complexion. Please tell me of something harmless that I can use indefinitely without danger.

"M. L."

In my opinion, when blonde hair begins to grow dark, the wisest thing to do is to let nature take its course. Bleaching it looks 100 per cent better than it does when it is dark. If you don't want a woman in our town to deceive, any one who bleaches her hair is a fool. I would like to see the woman who bleaches her hair, and she will have a very bad complexion. She will have a very bad complexion. She will have a very bad complexion. She will have a very bad complexion.

makes every line deeper, and every blenish more prominent.

I know of no bleach that will not dry and kill the hair if used constantly. Of course, preserving the natural color of the hair is quite different from bleaching it. Sometimes an egg shampoo is very good for keeping light hair light. Four eggs beaten up are used in place of soap for cleansing and lathering.

The lemon rinse, while recommended usually as a preservative of the light tint, is not as satisfactory, as a rule, as it is claimed to be.

Camomile tea is excellent for retaining the natural color of the hair and can be used with perfect safety. Take about three table spoonful of the tea leaves—which you can purchase at any drug store for about fifteen cents—and steep them in a quart of water in which is added a half pound of sugar and a little salt. After the tea is thoroughly brewed, add one pint of cream.

A few drops of peroxide may be used instead of cream. It is added after the cream has been strained off. The danger of the peroxide is offset by the cream. If the hair is naturally dark, it is not a matter of how long it is, but the hair is naturally brown.

CARD OF THANKS

I wish to express my sincere thanks to my many friends for their kindness and assistance to me following the accident and death of my husband.
