Mouth Health and Body Health

By P. P. McCain, M.D.
President, North Carolina Medical Society

It is not only true that decayed and abscessed teeth and diseased gums cause various diseases in other parts of the body, but it is also equally true that disease of the teeth and gums results from poor general health, from a neglect of health habits and from improper diet. Mouth health and body health, or mouth disease and body disease, usually go hand in hand.

For many years it has been known that germs grow and multiply in the pockets of decayed teeth and that oftentimes both the germs and the poison from the germs and the decayed food pass into the blood stream through the porous roots of such teeth and are carried to all parts of the body. Also at times abscesses form at the roots of dead teeth which have been filled. Rheumatism, neuritis, lumbago, sciatica, disease of the eye and of the heart, et cetera, are at times caused by germs and poison which get into the body in this way.

It is by no means true, however, that all such diseases are caused by bad teeth and diseased gums. In some quarters teeth have been too ruthlessly extracted. When some of the above mentioned diseases are present all of the possible sources of the trouble should be searched for and the teeth should not be removed unless it is at least reasonable certain that they are responsible for the trouble.

taining sound teeth and healthy gums as taking a proper diet containing not only the necessary food values, but also a sufficient quantity of the proper vitamins and minerals. On account of the extra demands upon them it is especially important for growing children and pregnant women to take the best of care of their teeth possible, to take the proper diet, and to observe proper health habits.
