Soil Samples Termed A Must

Like buying a pig in a poke—that's the way H. D. Godfrey, State Administrative Officer for the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation, describes the carrying out of soil conserving or soil building practices without the benefit of a soil analysis. Hit or miss methods have no place whatever in modern-day farming. For that reason, the 1954 Agricultural Conservation Program makes the taking of a soil sample and the receipt of a soil analysis mandatory before federal cost-sharing may be allowed on many ACP practices that will be carried out this fall.

Godfrey reports that under the 1954 Agricultural Conservation all practices involving the establishment of a permanent cover of perennial legumes and grasses or the initial improvement of an established grass-legume cover will require a soil analysis showing the amount of limestone required before the producer will be eligible for cost-share assistance under the program.

Records at the State ASC Office indicate that there are thousands of North Carolina farmers who have signed up for ACP practices requiring a soil sample, says Godfrey. He requests that these farmers take their samples at the first opportunity. Mail them directly to the Soil Testing Laboratory, State Agriculture Building, Raleigh, North Carolina.

The Soil Testing Lab is now caught up on soil samples and can render prompt analyses; however, Godfrey urges farmers to take and submit their samples now while this condition exists since the Soil Testing Laboratory expects to be flooded again by fall-seeding time.

Lodge Guest Grows Tomatoes Professionally

The following article on tomatoes was sent in by Fred Bruckmann of the Blue Bear Lodge, Rt. 1, Robbinsville. The story was published in the Cincinnati Times-Star recently.

Mr. Bruckmann said Mr. and Mrs. Moeller, of the article are annual visitors of the Blue Bear Lodge.

The article follows: The last word in tomatoes can be found clinging to vines in the glassed-in farm of William E. Moeller, 2414 Banning Road, (Cincinnati, O.)

Under 3,000 square feet of glass of Moeller's greenhouse tomato farm, are 12,000 tomato plants which, from last month until July 15, will bear 15,000 eight-pound baskets of tomatoes.

These will include tomatoes shot with hormones, pink tomatoes, green tomatoes and red tomatoes.

In one glassed-in building are housed 42 selections of tomatoes which Moeller raises for research purposes in cooperation with the Ohio Department of Agriculture.

Object of the research is to perfect disease resistance. Resist-
