FIRESIDE CHATS
 An interesting and interested group, with a welcome to others, has been meeting every other Sunday afternoon at 4 at the John C. Campbell Folk School at Brass-town for a book review.

The next session convenes this Sunday for the third section of the review of the "Life of John John D. Rockefeller." It is significant and important life and an altogether delightful book. There is value in each session quite independent of previous sections.

Those whose time for reading is limited can here get the essence of an unforgettable book in a total of six hours, when it would take even the fastest reader thirty-five hours to read it.

Marketing specialists with the U. S. Department of Agriculture say they may set a new record. Through October were valued at 36 per cent above a year earlier, and exports of farm products from July or the year ending next June 30.

Another way to get the feel of the road is to try a sudden acceleration in a safe place to see how much traction you have.

Farm Income From Forests Can Be Increased
 North Carolina farmers have immediate opportunities for increasing farm woodland incomes says John Gray, specialist in charge of forestry extension at North Carolina State College.

The immediate opportunity, says Gray, is through tree planting under the Conservation Reserve phase of the Soil Bank program.

For he points out, farmers can be reimbursed up to 80 per cent of the cost of establishing trees on former croplands. The annual rental on these plantings is 10 dollars per acre.

A second way, says Gray, is through farmer self-employment and hiring help to harvest and market forest products instead of selling standing timber. Gray points out that net wages earned, after subtracting stumpage value and allowing for equipment operation and depreciation, should be slightly over one dollar per hour.

Gray says good management of existing forested areas will greatly increase the profits obtained.

He points out that there is no foreseeable limit to the demand for most North Carolina farm forest products over the next 20 to 40 years. He estimates that approximately 70 per cent of domestic production of forest products come from farm woods lands.

Gray says farmers own approximately 63 per cent of the state private commercial forest lands. Since these are mostly in areas of less than 50 acres, the importance of good management for future production and income can not be overlooked, he adds.

Chick Producers Should Plan Expansion
 "North Carolina is in a healthy position for some expansion in poultry," says E. W. Glazener, head of the Poultry Science Department at North Carolina State College. But he warns that increased expansion is dependent on increased efficiency in production, producing at lower costs, and improvements in marketing systems and marketing practices.

Glazener believes that in particular, there seems to be a need for increase in the volume of products handled by marketing firms. Although in the last five years the gross value of poultry products in the state has practically doubled, Glazener indicates that the rate and limit to any expansion will be based on the success which North Carolina poultrymen have in competing with poultrymen from other areas for the national market.

North Carolina is now selling approximately one-half its annual broiler output outside the state, points out Glazener. But more concentration of production and increased processing facilities are needed in some areas, he adds, for the hauling distance to processing plants for live broilers is too great to achieve maximum efficiency in these areas.
