Helpful Hints For Home Meat Curing

If you haven't killed hogs yet, it's too late — unless you are close enough to a locker plant that can process the meat for you.

The weather after March 1 is usually too uncertain to do farm curing.

John A. Christian, animal husbandry specialist for the N. C. Agricultural Extension Service at State College, says there are still "many hogs on Tar Heel farms to be slaughtered for home consumption". These hogs can safely be processed most any time where locker and plants are available. Most communities have locker and processing plants available to slaughter, process and cure these "late" arrivals.

The important things in hog killing are, of course, curing and care of red meats. Meats hanging in smokehouse must be taken care of to see that insect damage is kept to a minimum. Beginning March 1 this becomes highly important, declares Christian.

Any meat that is cured in a locker plant and brought to the farm during the spring and summer months should be bagged and hung immediately to allow for moisture loss so the meat will age properly. At no time should cured meat be put on shelves or in baskets. This causes molding and off-flavors. It takes about six months for a ham to develop the right age flavor, says the specialist. Hams hung during the summer months will attain a high flavor as temperature in the 80's is necessary to develop "high ago" flavor.

Christian reminds farmers that in this day and time "Anytime is hog killing time", but insists that temperature is the hog killer's biggest enemy.
