Editor Finds New Way To Keep Daughter Happy

By PHYLLE BABB Anyone having trouble entertaining a two-year-old? I've solved the problem. Just fill your backyard with crabs.

We share the garden around our home with a community of at least 2000 crabs in varying sizes. They scare me completely out of my wits but Laurie (my two-year-old) thinks they are simple charming. I have found that one crab in a glass jar will keep her enthralled for no less than two hours. By the way, the maid puts the crabs in jars. Not me!

People swear these monsters will not come into the house but they have failed to convince me. If these crabs can climb a tree, I can see no reason why they can't climb steps.

While we are on the subject of varmets, I must tell you about the flies. They tare tremendous. Just about the size of our humble bees at home. But, even flies can be interesting. They come in shades of green, yellow or orange. Just take your pick. The standing joke, when anyone comments on the flies is, "Don't worry so about them." They don't eat much.

The other day we had a marvelous time touring the department stores in Tokyo. All of the ones we went to were located on Ginza street.

Ginza Street is perhaps the most famous street in Japan. All of the better stores and shops in Tokyo are found along this strip.

The windows of the big department stores were exotic. Any one of them could compete with Saks Fifth Avenue. One thing that impressed me about most of the window displays was that they were the last word in originality. Also, they didn't seem to be advertising anything in particular as our store windows at home do. They were just decorated to be attractive. And they are more than that.

All of the stores along the Ginza are geared to high class clientele. Everything we saw was sky high. These department stores sell anything from kimonos to groceries. We were amused when we stepped on the escalator in one of the stores. There was a darling pint sized girl bowing and murmuring a greeting to each ascending or descending shopper.

My husband, a lowly Lieutenant, got quite an ego boost on our maid's first day with us. She came to me and asked, "usband General?????"

ending shopper. This custom is carried on in all of the larger department stores.

There are many interesting features about these stores, but I think there is one in particular. Department stores not only carry ordinary merchandise but also serve as a market place for native goods. There is an entire floor in all of the larger stores devoted entirely to Japanese handicraft.

All of the buildings along the Ginza are the ultimate in modern design. The stores are giant size and range from four to eight or more stories high.

Japan is famous for its tea houses' and I can see why. They are completely luxurious.

The first one that we visited was lovely. It was four floors high with purple satin walls. Each floor was a high round room with a large round hole in the middle so that you could look completely through the building. Between the second and third floor was a suspended platform for the orchestra.

At each landing on the stairs was a window with a most intriguing array of antiques. One window had a display of antique pipes, another perfume bottles, another, clocks and watches and still another had wine glasses and snuff boxes. There were even some early American pieces in this collection.

An interesting feature of the second "tea house" was her appearing and disappearing orchestra. I had about decided that Japanese tea must have some unknown quality which caused one to suffer from hallucinations, when I was informed that the orchestra was on an elevator. It would do a number at one floor and then go up or down to the other floors, continuously playing as it moved along.

We discovered on our visits to the tea houses that you had better be prepared for whatever kind of sandwich you order, being spread with plenty of horsradish and butter. Heavy on the hors-radish!
