A LIVING WAGE?

We all have been doing a lot of reading lately about the new minimum wage.

Naturally, a 75-cent minimum wage is not enough for anyone to be able to live on.

Now, I do not say that the people who now have to pay a minimum of 75 cents can afford to pay a higher wage until we, the people, are willing to pay more for certain services. But we must remember something very basic and something very fundamental: When the federal minimum wage was first introduced and then gradually raised there went up a howl to high heaven that business all over our nation would come to a complete standstill, that profits would be a thing of the past, that everybody would be unemployed very soon. As always, when these prophets of doom yell the loudest, the opposite has been true. More people are working for a living. We have more over-all prosperity than we ever had. Profits in most industries are better than they have ever been. To get some people used to a change, obviously, is much harder than to teach them to learn to dance on a tight rope. But in a free society, people must have the privilege to raise all kinds of fuss against any changes, even though the motives are always purely selfish.

Many people have not as yet reached the point where they understand that happiness multiplies as we divide it with others and the same is true with money—that also multiplies if one spreads it and shares it more evenly with others. If I would own a laundry, I would pay higher wages than what my competitors do now, and I would hang a sign outside my shop telling the people that my 5 or 8 employees have to pay the same prices for groceries as the workers who work in a big company; that my 5 or 8 employees have to eat at least twice a day and have to clothe and feed their children, and that they can't do it unless I pay them at least $1.25 an hour; that, therefore, starting tomorrow morning the prices for cleaning shirts and bed sheets will go up by 25 cents each. Do you know what would happen? I would get more traffic than I could handle, and I would have to hire another eight employees to come and take care of all the customers who want their pillow cases and underwear washed in a place where people get a living wage.

And if I would own a restaurant, I would just charge one cent, or two cents more for a cup of coffee, and 25 cents more for the steak, and tell the customers that my waitresses and the cooks cannot very well live on love alone, they have to pay also for food, shelter and clothing. Before three months, I would have to build a bigger restaurant. The public

Before three months, I would have to build a bigger restaurant. The public must be willing to pay a fair price also to those people who are very, very small businessmen, and who do not have the power that one of the co-called "ethical" drug companies has to force the consumer to pay a dollar for a 1-cent pill. Free enterprise must have a conscience, and in a democracy people must think of their neighbor. If not, we automatically invite the state or the federal government to step in and tell us what to do. I only wished our last legislature would have stepped a little bolder and livelier when they voted on the minimum wage. Let's hope that in the next legislature there will be sufficient men and women who know enough about the facts of life to write legislation that will not be mockery for our people nor for our state. It would be interesting to ask each and every legislator whether he has lately worked and fed and clothed his family on the present minimum hourly wage. (Paid Pol. Adv.)
