

PICK THE WINNERS

FOOTBALL CONTEST

Dear Sally
By Sally Shew

DEAR SALLY: My fiance is scheduled to serve as best man in a wedding and reception, but am not a member of the wedding party itself. The maid-of-honor is an unmarried sister of the bride, and now my fiance has told me that "good taste" decrees that he must act as the escort of this girl at the reception and that he must, of course, take her home after the reception. I think he's trying to throw a curve ball past me. What do you say? DORIS.

DEAR DORIS: Hit that curve ball right back at him! Your fiance is engaged to YOU, not the bride's sister, and his first obligation is to YOU, no matter whose wedding it happens to be.

DEAR SALLY: To be perfectly blunt, I'm a liar. I told a real cute doll of 20 that I was 22, and I'm really 27. I had an idea that she'd be more interested in me if I were closer to her own age, and that she might think 27 was too old. Since then we've been getting along famously, but now that I'm beginning to introduce her to some of my friends -- former high school and college classmates -- she's certain one of these days to find out about the five years I hacked off my age. What should I do? ANANIAS.

DEAR ANANIAS: Confess your fib immediately to the girl, and tell her why you did it. Since you've been getting along so "famously" with her, as you say, she'll more than likely laugh at you for your foolishness and make you promise "no more fibbing."

DEAR SALLY: My son is marrying a girl whose name is Helen Van Dyke. I'm having some monogramming done for her on linens, but don't know whether the monograms should be "V" or "D." Nobody in the department or stationery stores seems to know either. I want to be sure to do this in proper and tasteful fashion. Should I make these monograms "V" or "D," or possibly "Van D"? MRS. R.T.

DEAR MRS. R.T.: It is usual these days for the bride to use her married initials, instead of her maiden initials, as in former times -- unless she has linens in a hope chest done long before she met her groom. If your new daughter-in-law follows the modern custom, she would use, in her case, the "V," rather than the "D" -- although "Van D" is permissible -- and her monogram would be "HVT" (or "HVandT") with the "T" the deciding factor in any arrangement of the monogram.

DEAR SALLY: My wife and I are in a real predicament now. We eloped and were married secretly last June, and no one else knows about this. Now our parents are making plans for a big wedding. We both love our parents dearly and we know how deeply hurt they would be if they knew we are already married. We would like very much to have a church wedding, but we're wondering if it would be against the law for us to go through with it, since we've already had a secret civil marriage. Please, will you advise us? J.B.

DEAR J. B.: I could, of course, say that since you both so stoutly declare your love for your parents and your unwillingness to hurt them, you should have thought of this in the first place and bided your time until they could be present at your real marriage -- but this is water over the dam. You can now, with perfect legality, go through the church ceremony, even though you're already married.

DEAR SALLY: I'm a girl of 15, and have a very good girl friend whose allowance is about three times bigger than mine. By the end of a week I'm broke, and she always insists on treating me to a movie or to cokes or hamburgers. I feel like a sponger, and am afraid if this keeps on it could eventually end our friendship -- and since I like her so much I do want to keep being friends with her. What should I do? ANGIE.

DEAR ANGIE: If I were you, I'd stop the charity program. Tell your friend that you appreciate her generosity, but that you can no longer accept it. There are plenty of interesting things you can do and places you can visit that are free. Let your friend know that she doesn't have to buy your friendship.
