AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION SERVICE

JOHN G. RICHARDSON
Robeson County Extension Chairman

Each year the Soil Testing Laboratory with the N.C. Department of Agriculture provides a summary of all soil samples that have been submitted from a given county during the past fiscal year. The latest statistics include the period from July 1, 1981, to June 30, 1982, and indicates that Robeson County had an increase in the overall participation in the soil testing program from the previous year.

The summary showed some comparisons that may be interesting. Of the 4,300 samples that were submitted, 225 were from home grounds, while 313 were in the miscellaneous category. This group would include gardens, trees, special samples submitted for diagnostic purposes, et cetera. Therefore, this resulted in a total of 3,651 samples being submitted directly for information for crops.

A comparison of the figures clearly indicate that people who plan to grow cotton and small grains as the next crop apparently are more interested in being aware of the soil fertility situation, while tobacco and soybean producers on the average show less interest in the soil fertility situation.

While 16,000 acres of tobacco are grown in Robeson County, only 408 acres were submitted to obtain tobacco fertility information. Also, with soybeans commanding the largest number of acres for production in Robeson County, at more than 110,000, there were 1,101 samples submitted with soybeans indicated as the next crop to be grown. Corn farmers submitted 1,336 samples to provide them with information on fertilizing the 90,000 acres that are grown here.

As in last year's report, this report again clearly demonstrates that our small grain and cotton producers are more closely attuned to securing information for the production of these two crops. With 20,000 acres of small grain grown locally, there were 550 samples submitted to secure information for the production of this crop. Cotton has the highest ratio of samples submitted to acres grown, with 367 samples for the 10,500 acres. It is evident that the small grain and cotton producers are somewhat more interested in knowing exactly what the conditions are on their farms prior to planting these crops.

Always, one of the real interesting observations on the soil test summary is one relating to pH levels. Since pH is so critical in the availability of nutrients and the subsequent production of crops, it seems appropriate to share this bit of information. Of the 3,651 field crop samples analyzed, 292 or 8 percent had a pH of 4.9 or less, while 703 or 19.26 percent had between 5.0 and 5.4. These figures are considered below the optimum for crop production, and it is obvious that nearly 30 percent of all samples indicate a need for more lime.

Other pH figures showed 1,280 or 35.07 percent in the 5.5 to 5.9 range, with 1,051 or 28.78 percent in the 6.0 to 6.4 range. There was an additional 325 or 8.9 percent above 6.5 on the pH scale.

We are pleased that the summary indicates a continuing increase in the utilization of the soil testing program, and we encourage anyone who is trying to grow plants of practically any type to test the soil periodically. Soil testing supplies and other information relating to this important program are readily available at the Extension Office.
