EDENTON, AUGUST 20.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in New-York, to his friend in this state, dated July 29, 1789.

You know that I was from the first warmly opposed to the new constitution, and principally because the Congress were not expressly prohibited from dangerous exercises of power, which might be attempted, though they could not be fully justified under the constitution. I confess, when the adoption took place, I lost all idea of amendments; supposing that when the Congress were in possession of power, they would not of themselves, take any steps to diminish it, and would be jealous of any other endeavours for that purpose.

You judged more favourably, and concluded that they would propose some material amendments, if with no other view than to give more general satisfaction. I have now the pleasure to acquaint you, that I was yesterday in the house of representatives, when the committee of eleven (one from each state) made their report on the subject. It consisted of most satisfactory amendments indeed; the rights of conscience—the liberty of the press—the trial by jury in all common law cases, and other things I do not so particularly remember, are all included, and guarded in the plainest manner. My heart warmed when I heard the report read, and I am assured there is no reason to doubt that these amendments will take place. I wished to send you a copy now, but as they are but just printed, I fear I cannot get one in time. I will, however, send you one by the earliest opportunity. You now will exult over me perhaps, on the superiority of your opinion to mine. It is supposed, however, that the critical situation of your state, had much weight with some of the members; and in particular, that this event may be in a great measure ascribed to the address of your Governor and Council to the President, which is here universally applauded, and the members in general say, that they are heartily willing to remove any fair scruple of North-Carolina, when her sentiments are moderate and becoming. I hope, indeed, that since so many states have adopted, North-Carolina will at all events come in. Her remaining out of the union can now only serve to embarrass the general government, and perhaps totally ruin herself. Since the fervour of party has abated, I have indeed had very serious thoughts about the danger of disunion—and I have been the more alarmed, in consequence of the accounts some of my friends give me, that the people in England and Nova-Scotia plume themselves very much on the separation of your state from the others, and with the utmost ridicule and contempt say, we never shall agree but under the nursing protection of Great-Britain. It is full time indeed to look about us, when such language is held by people who we well know with America ill, and have nothing so near their hearts as our destruction and disgrace. But as now all parties are like to be satisfied, I hope we shall unite to a man, to shew them that in a very short time we shall be superior to their malice, as we have already to their cost shewn we entertained the utmost contempt for their power.
