An Expert Talks of Fried Chicken

(Imperial Magazine)

Duncan Hines, the author of Adventure in Good Eating, the best of all guide books to eating places in the United States, says that he has probably visited more inns in America than any other man. With this book in the side pocket of an automobile, touring takes on a new aspect, freeing the motorist from dependence on hot dog stands and standard hotel menus.

Despite years of travel in congested and sparse regions, Hines is generally dissatisfied with the fried chicken that is found in public eating places. John T. McCutcheon, the Chicago Tribune cartoonist, agrees with him and some years ago McCutcheon prepared a cartoon on the subject. Thousands sent in their recipes for fried chicken, but both Hines and McCutcheon still insist that the only way to fry chicken is the way George Ade's Indiana cook does it. Hence, for the benefit of our readers, we are reprinting the recipe:

"Dress and joint the chickens the day before they are to be fried. Put the joints into cold salt water for at least an hour then put them on ice."

"Before frying, roll each piece lightly in flour and fry in one third butter and two thirds lard. Add salt and pepper after the pieces are in the skillet. Fry slowly until brown. Then put all the pieces in a roaster and pour a little water over them, also some butter. Cover the roaster and keep it in a slow oven and keep it in a slow oven and steam for an hour to an hour and a half. Add a little more water, if needed, to keep the pieces from getting dry."

"Add to a lightly browned (not too thin) cream gravy all the scrapings from the skillet and roaster."

HOUSE OF FOAM

Intrepidly we built a house of foam, Its windows looking westward, water thin; Never the silver threshold of our home Shall crumble, or its green walls topple in! Such is the curious faith we have in sand, To coastwise kinship out of reach of those Who have grown long accustomed to the land, Tasting no salt on any wind that blows.

We, who have learned to read tides, repel White fury when the cresting surf breaks high, Sheltered though for hang heavy where we dwell Rooms are forever open to the sky— Yet strangers who come knocking at our door See only driftwood and deserted shore!

—Leslie Nelson Jennings
