Attack on Employment Bias Set

WASHINGTON — The NAACP made six proposals aimed at blocking discrimination by southern state employment agencies this week, including passage of a national fair employment practices law.

Clarence Mitchell, director of the Association's Washington Bureau, appeared before the General Subcommittee on Education of the House to specifically protest job bias acts against three Savannah, Georgia, Negro women. The trio asked the NAACP to intercede when they were advised that they had failed a stenographic aptitude test and would not be permitted to learn their scores and they would never again be allowed to take the test.

"This is typical of what happens in the vast training programs that are supposed to equip individuals for the demands of modern industry," Mitchell testified.

The Savannah employment project was jointly sponsored by the U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the Georgia Department of Labor and the Chatham County Vocational Educational Program - all supported by public taxes.
