

ODDLY ENOUGH

SAFETY

Oddly enough, your safety often depends on... steel pipe in many cities, pedestrians caught in the middle of busy intersections are protected by safety islands surrounded by sturdy butt-welded steel pipe.

What's a traffic light mounted on to assure that it will remain in place even during high winds and violent storms? Strong, long-lasting steel pipe, of course. Meanwhile, steel pipe conduits protect the electric power lines that keep traffic signals in operation.

Outdoor semaphore stands and communication systems, used to keep U.S.A. railroads safe, almost always rely on butt-welded steel pipe.

Children's television can be informative as well as entertaining. Current proof of this is "The Funny Company," a new show now being seen on local television throughout the country. Each five minute segment includes at least a minute-and-a-half sequence providing background information about an interesting subject that has been logically developed during the animated comedy portion of the show. Shows viewing the Wisenheimer, an imaginative "super computer" which is one of the many ways of introducing educational sequences, are (from left) Super Chief, Buzzer Bell, Shrinkin' Violette, Jasper N. good judgment. Plants need more water on a bright day than on a cloudy one. Regulation of the night temperature is important during cold nights. This is especially true if you have tomato plants.

Now is a good time to plant apples, peaches, plums, cherries, pears and grapes. When planting, dig a hole large enough to accommodate root systems without crowding. Separate top and subsoil and place the top soil around the roots. After the roots are well covered, pack with your feet to within about four inches of the top of the hole. Finish filling with loose soil. Set the plants as deep as they stood in the nursery row. You can easily identify this soil line at the base of the plant.

Don't overlook the dwarf type fruit plants. They are well suited for areas where space is a problem.

If you have apple and peach
