Moving on at Durham High

By Demetria McArthur

This year a new committee has been organized in order to allow students to voice their opinions in the school. The name of the committee is the Social Concerns Committee. The complaint of not being to speak through the student council has been a lasting one. Harold Barnette, a black student at DHS, chairman of the committee. Harold organized such a committee after hearing the complaints of the students. The complaints come mainly from the black students at our school, who felt they were not represented directly by the student government.

Harold presented an outline of the committee and its purpose to the principal. Of course he was skeptical of the committee. Now, Mr. Freeman appreciates the part of the committee and the role it has played in involving more students and their voice in the government.

This committee consists of some whites but mainly black students. Such topics have been discussed: Dixie, the school newspaper, the cafeteria, cafeteria's conditions, election procedures, restricted memberships in certain clubs and organizations, the boycott, the relationship between black and white students, and school activities.

The committee has proven effective and successful. It meets each Thursday after school. It is acclaimed by many members of the student council.

Harold is considering many changes in the committee to further the purpose of the group. Harold graduates this year but hopes that the committee will continue to progress.

Livingstone Col. New Pres. Gives First Address

Livingstone College's new president gave his first formal address to faculty and students yesterday and he laid the frame work within which all would be involved in reaching the goals of the institution and of society.

Dr. F. George Shipman said that student involvement and participation is the life of the college was a major question which had emerged in his talks with students and faculty members individually, and in small groups since he began work here on a parttime basis on February 11.

"It is imperative that we, the faculty and students, do some serious thinking about the challenge this question presents," he asserted.

"To address ourselves properly to the question, we must first ascertain the nature and extent of students' concerns and, secondly, how faculty and students work together to remove the causes of these concerns," he continued.

The Livingstone president pointed out nine areas of concern among students across the nation.

They were: campus rules and regulations, apathy of faculty and administration, apathy on the part of students, crowded condito rooms, lack of student services, crowded conditions in classrooms, lack of student services, artificial stimulation by subverdraft after graduation, and the lack of job opportunities upon the completion of their college careers.

In elaborating on six of the student concerns, Dr. Shipman said that he was gaining an acute awareness of the tremendous capability of the faculty and staff at the college and their commitment to learning and creative living in the academic community.

"I believe in this faculty and staff," he asserted, "and will support them in their genuine efforts to fulfill their commitment to teaching and learning and in their efforts to generate new and creative ways to be responsive to the concerns of students."

TV Star Takes Right Turn in Success Road

HOLLYWOOD—Four years ago as a beginning law student, handsome young Kenneth Washington left San Francisco to become a Hollywood actor. Now that Washington has appeared in over a dozen plays, TV shows and in a motion picture, he no longer doubts he took the right turn in the road.

On March 29, Washington plays his first comedy role in CBS-TV's "Petticoat Junction" series. The Negro actor portrays an old Army rival of Steve Elliott's (Mike Minor), who pops back into the scene when Steve bids for a government contract. The episode derives its title, "By The Book," from the nick name of the character played by Washington.

"Since I've been cast in dramatic parts, I was nervous about doing a comedy role," smiles Washington. "But it was a great experience. I only hope the audience has as much fun watching the show as I had in the performance."

Washington feels he laid the groundwork for his new life as an actor by spending after-school hours as an observer in a San Francisco courtroom.

"As a kid I wanted to be a lawyer," he explains. "When the other kids went to the movies, I headed for the courthouse where I watched real-life drama."

While in college, Washington appeared in his first play, "The Hasty Heart." "Immediately," he confesses, "I was hooked on acting." It was then Washington gave up his law studies to concentrate on a theatrical career.

Prof. Offers Service For Race Relations

NOTRE DAME, Ind.—A police officer comes abreast of the driver's side of the car he has just pulled to the curb and says to the Negro at the wheel, "Let's see your license, boy."

"If you want to see my license, call me 'sir,'" the Negro responds angrily.

"If you act like a boy, I'll call you one. Let's see your license."

"If you want to see my license, call me 'sir.'"

Although few would deny this abrasive exchange could take place in many American cities, in this case both persons were South Bend rookie policemen, and their confrontation took place in a classroom where both were "role playing" for the benefit of human relations training.

The man leading the discussion analyzing the incident was Dr. Salvatore J. Bella, Jesse Jones professor of management at the University of Notre Dame. Saddened by the riots in 1967, Bella pondered what he could personally do and then walked into the South Bend police station to volunteer his services in human relations training.

The police took Bella up on his offer and put him to work organizing six hours of instruction during rookie training. "My first question before every class," Bella said, "is 'How many in this room feel they have prejudices? Raise your hand.' Every hand goes up—including mine—and the basic for dialogue is established."

Basically, Bella tries to give the young policemen and understanding of minority group feeling, a sense of how prejudices are formed, and the basis for a human relations approach to problem solving.
