

NEW CAREERS PROJECT OPENED IN WAKE COUNTY FOR EIGHTY POOR

RALEIGH—Eighty poor and unemployed adults in Wake County, North Carolina will get a chance to enter new careers, it was announced this week by Secretary of Labor George P. Shultz.

The workers will be employed as aides to professionals in education, recreation, social service, and community relations, under the U. S. Department of Labor's New Careers program.

Federal funds totaling $230,130 have been set aside for the project with the Wake County Opportunities, Inc. of Raleigh providing an additional $57,050.

New Careers seeks to relieve critical national shortages of professional service personnel in health, education, and public welfare by opening up jobs with built-in advancement opportunities to unemployed adults. These persons are trained as aides to librarians, teachers, nurses, medical technicians, social workers, and police officers.

They free professionals from performing tasks that do not challenge their full professional capabilities. At the same time the New Careerists move up a "career ladder" to positions which demand greater skill and pay higher wages.

To be eligible, an individual must be at least 22 years old, unemployed, and generally come from a family whose annual income is below the poverty line as defined by the Manpower Administration.
