U.S. Dis. Judge Questions OEO Dismantling

WASHINGTON — A federal judge last week questioned the Nixon Administration's right to dismantle the Office of Economic Opportunity, noting that it may be guilty of violating federal laws.

U.S. District Court Judge William B. Jones took under advisement three suits seeking an injunction to stop Acting OEO Director Howard Phillips from dismantling the anti-poverty agency but made no ruling in the case.

However, Jones rejected several arguments offered by John Kelson, who presented the Administration's case. In one instance, Kelson attempted to defend Phillips' failure to comply with federal law by citing a bill that had never become law because it was vetoed. "Mr. Kelson," Jones said, "you better get a stronger reed to lean on."

The suits, filed by several community action agencies and two unions representing OEO employees, claim —

*Phillips has failed to comply with federal laws requiring that he publish "all rules, regulations, guidelines, instructions and application forms" in the Federal Register 30 days prior to their becoming effective.

*Phillips is illegally serving as acting director because he has not been confirmed by the Senate.

*Phillips is conducting an executive reorganization without having submitted a plan to Congress and giving it 60 days to disapprove the plan as required by law.

*Programs mandated by Congress to be continued through fiscal year 1974 are being abolished.

*The application of fiscal 1973 monies to phasing out community action agencies, the backbone of OEO programs.
