

Tuned to today's tempo, American industry has developed a new electronic air cleaner that will help improve home environment. Some of the new room air conditioners are designed to take an electronic air cleaner that will entrap and filter out dirt and dust from the air, while the unit is in operation.

General Motors Frigidaire division has announced the new air cleaner will be available as an accessory for three new Frig units. The electronic air filter operates on much the same principle as giant electrostatic precipitators being used in utility stacks to help clean up the environment. The new compact unit will help do about the same job inside the home area where it is being used.

A handy householder will be able to install the cleaner himself. Common hand tools such as Phillips head and flat blade screw drivers and a hammer are all that are required. The electronic air cleaner cell can be removed without using tools and soapy water will wash away all the impurities. In normal use, the filtering cell need only be washed once every two months.

When the air cleaner is installed and in use, room air is drawn into the cell where it is electrically charged.

DEPARTMENT OF HOME ECONOMICS GETS PUBLIC SERVICE GRANT

The Department of Home Economics will conduct a $17,000 community service project during the 1973-74 school year under a grant from the U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

The community service project will involve the employment of a coordinator who can assist the department in meeting such requests, providing volunteers for various community programs, and offering direct educational services to Durham Area citizens.

Funding for the project includes the grant of $11,385 from the federal agency under Title I of U. S. Higher Education Act. State appropriations provide $3,987 and the university will provide $1,706 toward the cost of the project.

Included in the cost is the salary of the coordinator and pay for a part time program assistant and a part time clerk/typist.

Dr. Carson and members of the faculty will give their time to the project. Dr. Carson will serve as project director, and faculty members will work as consultants and teachers of short courses.

The project will include cooperative planning and evaluation conferences with various community agencies, consultative and professional services to individuals, families and agencies, an Informal Education Program, a consumer homemaking information program through mass media and the development of a Learning Resources Center for members of the community.

The informal education program will allow the department to offer short courses and seminars to residents of the Triangle area.

As the only institution in the Research Triangle area whose major purpose is training professionals to work directly with family and consumer problems and needs, the department has in recent years been deluged with requests for professional consultations with representatives of community agencies, according to Dr. Jean Cooper Carson, chairman of the department.

Short courses planned for the fall semester include a consumer education course, to be offered for four weeks, and a course in clothing construction, from six to eight weeks in length.
