for up to three months. It is the first foreign-based investigating mission to successfully penetrate extensive areas of the Philippine countryside under martial law conditions.

The team managed to cover practically all key community struggles in the country's three regions: Mindanao, Visayas, and Luzon. Direct investigation revealed that refugee communities are indeed large and growing, with people barely eking out a living from odd jobs and irregular government handouts. The continuous growth of the number of refugees is attributed to ongoing military encirclement and suppression campaigns against anti-government guerrillas and forcible evacuation and land grabbing techniques used to pave the way for the construction of government projects or government backed business ventures.

Investigating team members also had a close look at the "vigorous" organizing activities for armed revolution being undertaken in the rural areas. Some team members were invited by organizers and members of the New People's Army for interviews and tours of base areas. Others lived with squads of the Moro National Liberation Front for a few days and held numerous interviews.

Team members are also gearing up to testify in U.S. congressional hearings on U.S. aid to the Marcos dictatorship scheduled to begin early next year. For more information on the North Carolina visit, contact: Tim McGloin 489-0002 (Durham) and Bill Cummings 929-1861 (Chapel Hill).
